Mau Revisited.

Our narrative of a trip to central Maui and its plantations, has been interrupted to give place to a crowd of communications on political and other matters, thought to be of more general interest, and we resume our notes where we left off. After visiting Waieae and Waiehu, we returned to Wailuku. From there, across the low sandy plain to Ulupalakua, although the road is smooth and nearly level, is one of the most disagreeable rides that our islands furnish. In addition to the heat, clouds of sand are encountered, especially during the after part of windy days, and it is seldom that the wind does not sweep through this isthmus gorge, formed by the two high mountains flanking it. Squads of horses and cattle are seen grazing here and there, picking the short and scanty herbage, and, notwithstanding the apparent sterility of the soil, they appear sleek and fat, showing that the saline properties of the soil produce nourishing food for stock. The same peculiarity has been observed on other of the low flat lands near the sea throughout the group, some of which constitute the best pasture lands there are.

Kalepolepo and its Origin.

On the north shore of this isthmus, Kahului is the port, and a very good little harbor it is for vessels drawing not over twelve or thirteen feet, where the schooners Kamoi and Moi Keiki have for ten years or more run as regular packets, carrying the freight of the neighboring district. On the opposite or south shore of this isthmus is Kalepolepo, which signifies in vernacular "very dusty" or "dirty," and never was a place more appropriately named, for clouds of dust and sand daily sweep past it. It is not a village, and hardly deserves the name of hamlet, yet serves as the port or anchorage for vessels trading with the Kula region, from which large supplies of firewood are obtained for the Honolulu market, and for various plantations.

A Belle of California Days.

Here, on this dusty sandy beach, stands a large three-story frame building, erected in the days when the California gold fever carried off men of the strongest nerves, and fortunes were made and lost in supplying the gold-diggers with the necessities of life. To meet the growing trade, and to supply the ships, large and small, that then frequented Kalepolepo for potatoes, this building or rather pile of buildings, was erected to serve as warehouses, stores and dwelling. From the wreck and disaster that attended the wild speculations of those days—which seem now more like a fairy tale than stern reality—the present proprietor, J. J. Halstead, Esq., saved it and still lives here, as he has for the past fifteen years, honored and respected by all with whom he has to deal. Time deals gently with the patriarch of Kalepolepo, and those who have had the opportunity, as we have, to enjoy his hospitality, and sit down and hear him narrate the adventures and incidents of a singularly checkered life, will wonder how a gentleman so full of anecdote, narrative and social qualities, should ever have settled on this dreary spot, and more, that he should be contented and happy here.

The Cheapest Store in the Group.

It was mid-afternoon, when, with panting and belated horses we rode up to "Johnny's," as the natives call the place, and found a score or more of horses tied about the premises. Hitching ours, we entered the store, and found it filled with men, women, and children, and the major-domo himself behind the counter, busily trading with his country customers. The crowd at first excited our curiosity, but on inquiry, we found it was nothing unusual, and that the store presented only an every-day scene. A moment's inspection of its contents solved the riddle: for here on this sandy beach, ten miles from any village, was a country store filled with every description of goods required by the natives, (and by foreigners too,) selling at prices that defied competition even at "Archey's" or the "Bee-hive" in Honolulu. With the instinct of a genuine Yankee trader, who reads the newspapers and keeps posted up, our merchant of Kalepolepo some eighteen months or more ago, when prices were half what they now are, laid in a two-year supply of cottons, prints, &c., and, as a consequence, is able now to undersell everybody else, and draws customers from Wailuku, Makawao, and the districts of East Maui, and even Lahaina itself, who declare his to be the best stocked store and cheapest goods on Maui. And we have even heard of visitors from Honolulu buying prints and calicoes at Kalepolepo, at prices that would astonish our Honolulu clerks.

An Embryo Port.

At the opposite angle of this bay, there is a fishermen's hamlet called Maalaea, which is said to afford a good landing-place for freight in moderate weather, and where, we learn, a warehouse has been or is to be erected by Messrs. Louzada and Cornwall of the Waikapu plantation, and where the steamer Kilaua is to touch. Maalaea is located just at the foot of the West Maui mountains, and though exposed to the furious winds that sweep across the isthmus, during the night and early in the morning, affords a good anchorage close in shore.

An Extensive Sugar Estate.

The sun was rapidly declining behind the mountains as we remounted, and left Kalepolepo for Ulupalakua. The road lies along the beach for several miles, then ascends with an easy grade to the plantation of Capt. James Makee, where we arrived soon after dusk, and met a cordial welcome. The dwellings and mills are located at an elevation of some 1500 feet (we have not the exact figures) above the sea, which gives to the residence a more cool and bracing atmosphere than is found in localities near the shore. This plantation extends from the sea far up the sides of the mountain, and has every variety of land, from the barren and rocky shores, to the region bathed in perpetual clouds. It is the most extensive estate on the islands, and, including a purchase of 4,400 acres recently made by the proprietor, embraces 15,000 acres of land, or over twenty-three square miles of land. Much of this however, bordering on the sea, is of very little value, even for pasture land; while the more elevated portions, located from three to six thousand feet up the mountain, are covered with forests. It is the intermediate belt, lying between 1500 and 3000 feet above the sea, that furnishes good cane and pasture lands, not simply to this estate, but on other sides of this volcanic pile which constitutes East Maui. Probably not more than one-fifth of the land will be found available for the cultivation of cane on this estate of 15,000 acres.

A Mountain Residence.

What more charming spot could be selected for a country residence than a mountain rising 10,000 feet high, at an elevation on it just sufficient to secure perpetual verdure and sufficient moisture, with the most salubrious and balmy atmosphere imaginable, and from which the most extensive if not the most beautiful and varied panorama is afforded that the imagination can picture. Besides the broad blue ocean stretching off like a carpet, to the raised horizon on every side of this fairy scene, we have West Maui rising boldly in front, and separated from us by the bay of Kalepolepo, the distant little villages of Waikapu and Wailuku skirting its base, and the islands of Lanai, Molokai and Kahoolawe, with the little rocky islet of Mokolini at our feet, checking the scene and forming a picture that an artist might study for a lifetime. Such is the site of the beautiful home of Capt. Makee, which has appropriately been named "Rose Ranch"—such a home as the poet sighed for—

In a warm summer ocean far off and alone,
Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquet on through a whole year of flowers;
Where the sun lingers to pause
With so fond a delay,
That the night only draws
A thin veil o'er the day;
Where simply to feel that we breathe, that we live,
Is worth the best joys that life elsewhere can give.
A Planter's Garden.

As the stranger enters the garden in front of the dwelling, he is struck with the novelty around him—so unlike the scenery usually met elsewhere on these islands. Conical pines, cypresses and evergreens, stretching up thirty or forty feet, and skillfully trimmed, line the avenue to the door, and impart a princely air, which fails to leave the visitor during his stay. Roses of a hundred different varieties, grow here in all their native vigor, producing trees twenty feet in height, and flowers of fabulous size, color and beauty. Almost every variety of flower cultivated in gardens in the temperate zone, when introduced here, grow with remarkable thrift, as if in their own native soil and climate.

How to Train the Lantana.

While here, we observed the lantana trained to grow like a tree, and not, as is almost invariably seen elsewhere, like a bush. This plant, which was introduced in 1855, from Chile, by the late John Ladd, is becoming very abundant around Honolulu, and though not remarkable for beauty, may be trained, when pruned, to become an ornament to any garden or house-yard. In Capt. Makee's garden, we found it so trained, that, when covered with its yellow and variegated flowers, it is one of the prettiest attractions there. Where left to run wild, it will soon become a weed, hardly less noxious to the gardener than the indigo.

About Peaches.

Of fruit trees, the peach grows here luxuriantly and produces very abundantly. A large number of peach trees, perhaps a hundred or more, surround the dwelling. Occasionally one is found that produces fine fruit, but generally, like most of the peaches grown on these islands, the fruit is rather indifferent and inferior to that grown in other countries. This arises from the fact that seedlings, or trees raised only from the seed, will produce fruit here, the choice imported stock generally failing to bear. Or at least imported trees have not done well so far.
