POSTAL TELEGRAPHING.—The subject of cheap tion for their final doom. telegraphing has attracted public attention in England, and has been discussed between the Government and the telegraph companies. It originally intended that the Government should take all the telegraph lines, paying the owners therefor; but this was so strenuously opposed by the champions of vested rights that the Government has modified its bill and proposes to take only those lines which are willing to sell. As there are a number of competing lines in England, the Government will be at no loss to find some to buy. These lines, as they are purchased, become a department of the Post Office. The Government can extend, change, enlarge, or contract the sweep of these lines and increase their facilities for business.
