Encke's Comet - Its Expected Appearance.

Encke's comet is due, says the Providence Journal, and the star gazers are turning their telescopes to the skies in the hope of discovering the presence of the expected visitor. It is interesting chiefly for performing its revolution within the limits of the solar system for a comparatively short period within which its revolution takes place, and for the reason that we know more about it than we do of those vast ethereal creations which visit our system and then rush off into space.

Encke's comet, although it was really discovered by M. Pons on its return in 1816, was seen four times before its identity was determined. It was first detected by a French discoverer in 1795, then by Miss Caroline Herschel in 1795, again by a Frenchman in 1805, and lately by M. Pons in 1816. Astronomers began to mark the similarity of its orbit to that of the comet discovered by a Frenchman in 1805, and lately by M. Pons in 1816.

Encke's comet is by no means a remarkable one. It is a telescopic comet and consists of a circular patch of light, somewhat condensed toward the center. Though usually only visible through a telescope it has been distinctly seen by the naked eye on a few occasions. It is peculiar in that it is a favorable condition for observation, and its light was equivalent to that of a star of the fifth magnitude. At common times there is no trace of tail, but on rare occasions a slight one has been discerned, once as a faint brush of light extending from the comet towards the sun, and again with a second appendage opposite the first.
