New York Correspondence-No. 29. The Fall Season-Rev. Mr. Hepworth-The City

ward Tendency-Country versus City-Stewart's Philanthropic Enterprises.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 16, 1869. At this time last year the watering-places in the vicinity of New York were not yet deserted, for a delightful and lingering summer kept the city-people in the country. But this year the summer was cool, and the early autumn stormy. The return tide consequently set in much earlier than it did a year ago, and the fall campaigns in business, politics, and church-going are in full

The principal accession to the churches that the season brings is made by the coming of Rev. George Hepworth, of Boston, to supply the church of the Messiah in Thirty-fourth street,a pulpit which was vacated last spring by Rev. Dr. Osgood. Mr. Hepworth left an appreciative congregation in Boston, and the comfortable salary of $4,000 per annum, to accept the call to this fashionable church and a salary of $12,-000,-one of the largest church-salaries paid in this city. The "Messiah" church society, though not very large, is wealthy, and is much in love with its new pastor. The congregation, under but two Sundays of his ministrations, is already increasing noticeably in size. It had fallen off sadly during the past year of Dr. Osgood's preaching; for an incubus of manner- for laboring men,-a much more commendable ism, an inspissated dullness, had lately taken enterprise than that of building his marble possession of that minister, and only the most dwelling now nearly finished, upon Fifth Avenue, determined listeners could brave out his dis- within two minutes' walk of where I write. It courses. He is now writing letters from Europe is the bleakest-looking building in New York, to the Evening Post of this city,-letters which with the possible exception of the Tombs and are in the very drowsiest vein of Rip Van Winkle. the Penitentiary.

Mr. Hepworth, the new incumbent, is a young Mr. Stewart recently offered Mr. J. J. Jarves man of thirty-four, tall and dark, of pleasing the sum of $100,000 for his collection, now on address and a peculiarly graceful style of cratory. exhibition in New Haven, of specimens of the Hon. better worker than preacher. The arrival of Father Hyacinthe is now expected with great interest, and his probable attitude toward his own church forms a frequent subject of discussion for both the secular and the religious press. The "one-man power" in society, it is evident, is not yet entirely monopolized by the men of money. The day of the warrior-conquerors has gone by, and the day of great leaders in polities or in art ;-so difficult is it in modern civilization to break through the trammels of organized circumstance. The millionaires are to-day the real rulers of this conntry. Yet the thrill of sentiment which Father Hyacinthe's recent protest against the most ancient church in existence has sped around the world, proves that we have not entirely outgrown the fresher feeling of times like those of Luther

A profound religious sensation in New York Importer and Dealer in Boots, Shoes, Fine Clothing, City! The idea seems an anachronism and a paradox-yet there is a possibility, even a probability, of its becoming a fact. For almost everything comes to New York at last. Our cities, indeed, especially this metropolis, drain and exhaust the country. Last year it seemed as if a taste for country life were becoming more marked than before; city people are finding out that the attractions of the autumn season, at least, were not to be despised,-the cool weather, the abundant fruits, the splendid colors of the fall, the swift and splendid phenomena of change which nature there displays. It was a hopeful symptom; for there is among this people, as compared, for example, with the English, little inclination toward a rural life. Among them it is the ambition of the city resident to own his house and garden in the country. -to retire from business, some day, either to his cottage or his mansion in some quiet village remote from the city's noise and dust. But the American countryman is discontented at home ; and as soon as he has amassed a little fortune, whether as merchant, farmer, lawyer, or manufacturer, is very apt to make for San Francisco, Chicago, or New York. The tendency is not to the winter, bad enough in the cities but worse in the country, the absence of libraries, of society, and of all amusements but lectures, all conspire to drive young and old toward the less dark and dreary cities. Until the country towns become immensely more developed than they are at present, they will present, especially to the young, no charm that can counteract the powerful magnetism of the cities. Centralization is the result. Young men will rather freeze in the city as car-drivers, or steal as car-conductors, than lay up money in the country. Young girls instead of living in their monotonous country homes will come to the city and starve on sewing. It is in vain for Horace Greeley and others who write from their comfortable offices in the city, ed there and was bombarded with old gentle- to dissuade the dwellers in the country from n for an hour, perhaps, and all I got out of seeking their fortunes where they have made I. s. WALKER. their own. The country persists in offering us all its products; it will not be content with sending vegetables and poultry to town. The character as well as the crops of the country are whirled into the city by the morning trains. The best of brain and heart and will that the country can produce come to the mart of the metropolis; and there, too often, they are consumed like the flesh and the fruit in its devouring maw. House-keepers in the small towns, within fifty miles of New York, complain that the city spoils their markets. The juiciest fruits, the tenderest meats, are carried past their kitchen doors to be sold at city prices and eaten by city consumers. The countryman lives among plenty

No such counter-movement, however, has manifested itself in the vicinity of New York. In Massachusetts, however, they have a good example of what is needed in the little town of Peabody, late South Danvers, a suburb of Salem.

the intelligence and the ability of the country goes, also, to the city. Unless a counter-move-bears, this town is provided with a public library, a spacious lecture-room, and the germ of an artcollection, - all contained in a handsome and spacious building which is situated in the pleasantest part of the town. Among the paintings is the costly miniature of Queen Victoria, presented by her to Mr. Peabody in recognition of his immense charities to the poor of London. Such a place as this is indeed an attraction to the country. The time is apparently not far distant when Mr. Peabody's example will become fashionable among the wealthy, and our millionaires vie with each other in the magnitude of their gifts. But at present these gifts are generally applied in the city, with the result of making the city yet more disproportionately attractive as a place of residence to those who tire of the country. Upon Fourth Avenue, for instance, are rising the massive walls of A. T. Stewart's "Working Women's Hotel." This immense and comfortable building is to supply cheap and good lodging for many hundreds of working women, and it cannot be doubted that Office and Residence, Aldrich House, Fort street to its inmates it will prove a substantial benefit; but it is equally certain that the promise of comfort and cheapness that it holds out will attract to the city hundreds or thousands of girls who would do much better to stay at home. Another project of Mr. Stewart's seems to be without upon a large tract of the Hempstead Plains, upon Long Island, near this city, a village of homes
