

All Run Down

From the weakening effects of warm weather, by hard work, or from a long illness, you need a good tonic and blood purifier like Hood's Sarsaparilla. It will give you strength and appetite. It was completely run down, and was for nearly four years under medical treatment, being given to die by physicians. My mother urged me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla. At last I consented, and I have never taken anything which helped me as much as Hood's Sarsaparilla, which restored me to health and vigor. I have been taking it about four months and am now a different being. I can work all day with very little fatigue. I recommend it to any one whose system is prostrated. N. H. NORTON, Esq., Albany, N. Y.

Hood's Sarsaparilla Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared by C. I. HOOD & Co., Lowell, Mass. 100 Doses One Dollar

GRAND OPERA-HOUSE

TO-NIGHT and all this week, Matinee Wednesday and Saturday, W. H. GILLETTE'S Best of American Plays, HELD BY THE ENEMY THE

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

On account of an unavoidable delay, the engagement of the Prince of Comedians, GUS WILLIAMS

TO-MORROW (Tuesday) EVENING

BASE-BALL PARK LEAGUE GAMES. Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 15, 17 and 18.

Washington vs. Indianapolis!

PHILADELPHIA—Sept. 19, 20, 21 and 22. Two Games on THURSDAY, Sept. 20. Reserved seats on sale at Big 4 ticket-office, corner Washington and Meridian streets. Game called at 8:30 p. m.

INSURANCE DIRECTORY

- CLAY, HILARY, Mer. Central Ind., 66 1/2 Penn. St. Union Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Maine. FUNSTON, CHAS. B., Secy., 30 Vance Block. HOLLAND & GLAZIER, 92 East Market. HOBBS, W. H., 74 East Market. HUG, H. M., 42 Vance Block. LEONARD, JOHN R., 200 E. Building. MCGILLIARY & DARR, Gen. Ins. Agts., 42 E. Market. SUTLOW & MARSH, Managers, 90 1/2 E. Market St., for Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee and West Virginia for the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society of New York. Sheppard Homan's plan of pure life insurance, combined with banking, a specialty.

BORN & CO

Furniture, Stoves, Carpets, Weekly and Monthly Payments

Holland's One-Piece Fuel Gas Burner FOR Cooking and Heating Stoves, Furnaces and Grates.

CATARH is a disease of the mucous membrane, generally originating in the nasal passages, and maintaining its stronghold in the head. From this point it sends forth a poisonous virus into the stomach and through the digestive organs, corrupting the blood and producing other troubles, some of the most dangerous symptoms.

BRUSH BRILLIANCY Are and Incandescence ELECTRIC LIGHTS. THE BRUSH ELECTRIC COMPANY, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

THE HALL SHORT LINE TELEPHONE No dangerous electricity. Total cost less than the annual cost of gas. For particulars address THE HALL TELEPHONE CO., Broadway and Astor Place, New York City.

TO EVERY VOTER IN AMERICA Mr. Elmer's VOTER has just completed a little volume, entitled "FROM WASHINGTON TO CLEVELAND," the history and platform of all political parties from 1789 to 1888, which should be in the hands of every voter. To gain this and the price has been fixed so low as to place it within the reach of all. Free of charge by mail, registered, 60c. H. B. BROTHERS, 26 N. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

GRAND HOTEL INDIANAPOLIS, IND. Passenger elevator and modern conveniences. Leading hotel of the city, and strictly first class. Rates, $2.50, $3.50 and $5.00 per day. The latter including bath. GEO. F. FENIGER, Proprietor.

THE VIEWS OF OBSERVERS.

Mr. Litchman Says the Knights of Labor Are for Protection to Industries.

Gen. Fairchild Expects Maine to Give a Still Larger Majority in November—Working Against Texas Free-Trade Congressmen.

Charles H. Litchman, of Marblehead, Mass., spent Sunday in the city, preparatory to beginning a canvass of the State under the direction of the Republican committee. His labors will be principally confined to southeastern Indiana, where he expects to remain a week or ten days, after which time he will be subject to the orders of the committee. Mr. Litchman has for years been identified with labor organizations, having occupied the position of general secretary of the Knights of Labor. "Since 1874 I have voted the Greenback ticket," he said to a Journal reporter yesterday. "I was an ardent supporter of General Butler in the campaign four years ago, but I have not my eyes opened somewhat during the past two or three years. I know that I am severely criticized for what I have done, and it is my belief that in this country every man has a right to think as he pleases and to change his opinion as often as he pleases. A change of made for the better can certainly not be harmful, and it exhibits no weak will or political instability."

"You left the Greenback party after due deliberation?" "Yes, I have tried to make it a matter of serious thought. I have tried to be honest in all I have done. But, although I was candid and faithful in my work with the Greenback party, I have no hesitation in saying now that I will support Harrison and Morton. There can be no question, it seems to me, why a man should vote a Republican ticket in preference to the Democratic."

"How is General Harrison received by the Knights of Labor?" "The Knights of Labor do not introduce political questions in any shape whatsoever. They do not form a political organization, but, nevertheless, they all have ideas, and outside of their own proper sphere, they are all well thinking men. Hard workers as they are, they know what is best for their own interests, and no class of men is more quick to rebel against the dictates of a tyrannical or tyrannical syndicate. A part of them will vote the Union Labor ticket, and a part the United Labor, but exclusive of these, I think you will find that the majority of the Knights of Labor will support General Harrison. It is not because they are Knights of Labor that they will do this, but because they are working men who believe that protection to American industries means protection to their own wages. Let me tell you one thing—this is a campaign in which the laboring man is intensely interested. He knows that the labor vote will out a pretty large figure in the final result, and when it comes right down to a question of bread and butter he is not going to vote for the free trade Congressmen. The Democratic party forgets that its promises to the workmen are not even plausible when it is in favor of free trade. As a consequence, I am sure that the majority of the Knights of Labor will support General Harrison. They have perfect confidence in him as a man and a statesman. They do not look upon him in any other light than their friend."

Will Talk to Old Comrades. Gen. Lucius Fairchild, of Madison, Wis., who was in the city yesterday, will spend the coming week in campaign work in this State. To-night he speaks at Wabash, Tuesday night at Delhi, Wednesday at Tipton, Thursday at Noblesville, and Friday at Williamsport. For two weeks he has been in Maine, at the command of the Republican national committee, and there he met with unusual scenes of enthusiasm for the party ticket. "General Harrison," he said to a reporter last night, "will receive a larger majority in Maine next November than the Republican State ticket received last week. It is a good number, at least that is what I heard expressed on every side when I was there. The Republican party in Maine is in excellent condition. The Republicans there are exceedingly jubilant over the result of their recent election, and while they will vote for General Harrison, they do not see their discomfiture in carrying the State."

Opposing Roger Q. Mills. H. W. Nye, of Fort Worth, Tex., was in the city yesterday, on his way home from the Columbus encampment. Mr. Nye has the distinction of being a second cousin of Bill Nye, the humorist, and minus the wild beard he wears he would bear a close resemblance to his four-year-old Harrison and Morton badge on his breast, and said he was going home to work for the Republican nominees day and night until the election.

Texas will, of course, give her electoral vote to Harrison, he continued, "but nevertheless the protection sentiment prevails in the State. The Mills bill is very strongly condemned, and an effort will be made to defeat all the Congressmen who voted for it. The Republicans hold the balance of power in many of the districts, and by combining with the protection Democrats can overwhelmingly defeat the free-trade Congressmen."

"Is there any fight being made against Mills in his district?" he was asked. "A very determined one. He has not at all the friends he wishes he had in the committee in Congress, and bets were being made when I left home that he would be defeated. Many of the best Democrats in his district are opposing him, and nothing will be left undone to compel his defeat, because they believe him to be a dangerous man in Congress. I see by the papers he has gone home to look after his fowls, and he certainly needs to be there. The fact is, he has learned of what is being done to defeat him, and he has become frightened. I don't believe his presence will avail him anything, however. For the people have convictions on the tariff questions that cannot be changed."

On the Republican Irish Demonstration. Saturday, Sept. 15, 1888. There is a demonstration to show the Nation the inclination of our Irishmen. As with persons streaming, their faces beaming. The air was screaming the name of Deo.

Working Up Another Lie. Lafayette Courier. On his recent visit to this city Senator Voorhees gave out the quiet that the Democrats were preparing a great bomb-shell which is to be thrown into the Republican camp at an opportune moment, the said bomb to consist of allegations that General Harrison was at one time a member of a lodge of Know-nothings, of which his father was the head officer. This is the first time, we believe, that such a charge has been made against Mr. Harrison, and the fact that Senator Voorhees does not show the course to make a public announcement of the information he pretends in private to possess, stands as a bold thing as a campaign falsehood, the circulation of which should be beneath the dignity of a man of Mr. Voorhees's pretensions.

General Harrison's Letter. It shows an admirable faculty in the man of clear and cogent reasoning, and the possession of thoughts well deserving public expression. The letter is filled with sagacious epigrams, which are not mere catch-words, but will serve as such, while they convey a useful meaning. Of these, several in that portion of his letter which is devoted to the commendation to the lover of the English will commend them to the lover of their sentiments.—Albany Times (Dem.)

Senator Spooner's son lives in a house on B street, Washington. Young Mr. Spooner, under the spur of political enthusiasm, has covered not only the roof of his own residence, but the tops of two adjoining houses, with flag-staffs, upon which float the stars and stripes, and banners bearing legends advocating the election of Harrison and Morton. Three stanch Democrats, one a Senator and the others two representatives, who live in one of the decorated houses, have uttered a strong protest against young Spooner's aggressive patriotism. But the flag still waves.

Albany Times (Dem.) In the letter throughout is a credit to the literary training of the writer. It is not only strong in many passages, but it runs smoothly and evenly throughout. It will repay reading even by those who are politically opposed to General Harrison. It comes like a "potioneer" to the wounds of sound sense. Cleveland's loud "clattering" on the same subjects.

"I cannot praise Hood's Sarsaparilla half enough," says a mother whose son, almost blind with scrofula, was cured by this medicine.

HARRISON AT CLAYTON.

A Speech Which Excites the Highest Admiration of Literary Critics.

It is to be said of Indiana that, despite of its being the home of some of the most obnoxious copperheads with which the country was cursed during the war time, despite of some of its southern counties being scenes of rebel rioting, it was and is a strong solid State. Not only did the State in large numbers furnish an ample array of troops, but also of men of high character and ability, who contributed far in excess of their quota. It is a fact that the State has furnished more soldiers than any other State or county, and the soldiers' monument to be erected on the Governor's Circle, will be an enduring proof of the State's pride in and gratitude to her citizen soldiery.

Thus when General Harrison attended the fourteenth reunion of his old regiment, the Seventieth Indiana, at Clayton, he was greeted by a concourse of being so numerous and respectable. It was fit that no appearance of political bias should be manifest at such a time and place, and accordingly the position of the speaker was the veterans, and him who was their leader in war, was intrusted to a lady. And right well did Miss Mitchell acquit herself. The General's reply was a gem of the most brilliant and noble. The glory of the earth and sky, the ineffable peace of nature, touched and awakened a fine poetic feeling; his mind took in the quiet beauty of the scene, and he felt that the sternest of our fathers, when those who are now veterans, grizzled and gray, were the young heroes of the country, and his speech flowed forth in sober majesty that will be remembered for years to come. His sentiments were and ever will be in accord with the best aspirations of the best citizens, no matter what their party name may be. In the best feeling still entertained by the veterans, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon "the other side," nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore.

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

General Harrison spoke to men who did not enter upon the war in the first blush of enthusiasm, but who were called to arms in which the old Seventieth Indiana was recruited. In 1862 the cause of the Union seemed hopeless to many, doubtful to more, the prospect of the future dim. "I remember why I had that cast of eye; it is for evermore!" he said in his heart, if not on the lips, of many a patriot. "It was then," the General reminded us, "that I was feeling still and earnest, a feeling not of bitterness against those who fought upon 'the other side,' nor of pride of power, but of thankful rejoicing that the right should be in the hands of the righteous, and that the right should be forevermore."

OUR CANDIDATE.

A Man Who Has More than Verified the Predictions Made by His Friends.

General Harrison is vindicating his title to the honor he is wearing with such quiet dignity.