

already, in anticipation of the event, are experiencing rude shocks of shuddering, and I don't wonder if it is true, on his former visit to him in Geneva, that he was so much pleased by no means savory. My barber, even, who had the honor of shaving him daily, cannot speak of him without calling him a coon (hog). It is related that upon one occasion, when his Majesty was entertained at the aristocratic chateau of the Faber family, that after having been presented to Madame Faber by her husband, the lady's husband and told him, in audible tones, that Madame was ugly and stupid, she turned to get himself another and a better looking woman. At the end of the meal he raised his mouth and spat out the contents upon a plate before him. The scoldard and his wife scintillated with precious stones, but his hands were unempt and his hands unwashed, and the remembrance he and his staff drove was taken by hand in a washbowl from one of the bedchambers of the Hotel des Bergues, where they put up. When the dinner was over, the lady's eyes were next day presented for the articles which they had helped themselves to without reporting, and when the party took their departure their apartments in the hotel were found to be infested by creepers and biters, reminding one of Macaulay's account of Peter the Great's visit to the court balls of William and Mary, when he and his suit would "drop both peas and yerners."

JONES'S CAREER AS A HUMORIST.

Jones has met with adversity again. This time his ambition to be a humorist has been thwarted. Jones, however, is still in the adolescent stage, in some respects, or, as the medium says of the timid shade, he has not fully developed. His troubles, therefore, do not produce lasting depression. When Jones found that his harmless in-ter-est needed a self-adjusting controller, something that would meet the varying temperaments and physical conditions of all kinds of people—he renewed his scientific researches and experiments, but so far without result. Jones is a believer in experientialism; in fact, he is a professor of the doctrine, and he practices what he preaches. If he had been an intuitionist he would not have attained his present notoriety. His experiences have made him famous. He has never taken it for granted that such a thing was so because he intuitively sensed it in that direction. On the contrary, if he saw a statement that three bottles of beer or five glasses of whisky were sufficient to intoxicate an able-bodied man he would not be satisfied of its truth until he had learned it by experience. When he heard that his neighbor had played havoc with some of his friends, he tried it on himself, with the result that he added another to his long list of experiences. This explanation is made to expiate Jones in the eyes of members of his club who were ungracious enough to make unfeeling or insinuating remarks about his condition last week.

To readers who have followed those sketches of the peculiarities of Jones it must be now patent that he is a person of fertile ideas. If Jones was not an idealist he would never have risen from the millions of nonentities that live and die without attracting attention in the world. The other evening a new idea took root in Jones. He had been reading a comic paper, and the simplicity of some of the jokes impressed him. Like many others before him, and who know better now, he thought he could turn out scores of paragraphs of the same nature as he read. Now, when an idea strikes Jones he seizes it. It has no chance to escape until it has been run through his experience mill. So it was with his latest idea. Unlike most of his ideas, however, this one was a good one. It didn't need a gravestone to first discover that he was a humorist. A walk around Monument Place, with his eyes fixed on the figure of Indiana limned against the sky, was sufficient for him. Suddenly he smiled. The idea had borne fruit. He had twinkled a little faster, it seemed to Jones, as he walked to the "club" of one of his intimate friends. This friend is a connoisseur in the joke business, and Jones wished to astonish him. When Jones wanted to make an impression he doesn't expose his point too suddenly. He has a more diplomatic way; he skillfully leads up to it. So, when Jones had settled himself comfortably, he began talking about the new depression. After the subject had been discussed for a few minutes, and Jones found his guests could no longer be suppressed, he said:

"Say, doctor, the astronomer's business is looking up."

The doctor didn't seem so astonished as Jones expected. He had heard of it before. "Isn't original, I either read it or wrote it myself ten years ago. These were cruel words to Jones. The intention that he was guilty of plagiarism, when he knew himself to be innocent of the charge. Without willy he left the "den," and two hours later he started on a trip to Dreamland. On the way there he could not help worrying about the fact that the minds of great men sometimes run on parallel lines. When he arrived at Dreamland he found that the doctor had preceded him. Jones was not surprised. He never nurses his feelings and he met his friend in his usual good-natured way.

Here, perhaps, it is best to explain that Dreamland is one of the many Isles that dot the Sea of Brain. Almost every man, woman and child has visited Dreamland, but few have wittingly ventured beyond. Some have heard of the Isle of Roll, but not many know its location. It is peopled only by fugitives and those who are wobbly at will. It is a derelict of the Sea of Brain that no agency has the power to anchor or deanchor, and which has escaped its reef-lined shores or shifting sands. Orators, writers and conversationalists have suffered most from its influence. It continues to suffer till the end of time. There are many other islands of interest. Some have been explored by Jones and his friend. Once the Doctor visited Jokeland and returned with a report that he had been once to see it again. When he mentioned the place to Jones the latter appeared anxious to visit it, to be covered and were quickly waded to its shores. What Jones saw there was a revelation with mounds and tablets. In fact, it looked like a vast graveyard. His friend appeared to be well acquainted with the place and made an excellent guide for Jones. He explained that the mounds were the resting place of a family of jokes. Some were larger and higher than others. This the Doctor said was due to the fact that the original joke of that particular family had either been improved or neglected by his neighbors, or its brood had been more prolific. Jones read the inscription on one of the most venerable of the tablets. It was the simple word, "Mother-in-law."

By an ingenious method of calculation the Doctor, after measuring the huge mound near the tablet, found that the mother-in-law joke had been improved in some form or other, 35,840 times. Another large mound was shaped like a foot. It was labeled, "The Conical." Another ancient tombstone, told of Billy and Nanny Goss, that ate anything from a washing of clothes to old tin cans; others of troublesome stovepipes, sudden blizzards, and cakes baked by young wives; men who came home late and talked of fells and fuses in their sleep; and others of the kind that were always true, though they insisted they had been to lodge. Some of the tablets with smaller mounds, of the kind that were always true, Friend, Mr. and Mrs. Suburban, the Nevada accounts of the "Circus," which now a newspaper readers had found a home on the island. Even Jones's astronomer joke was there. One of the next mounds was marked "Circus, Minstrel and Variety Theater Gags." It was the largest mound of all and was probably the one that Jones did not tarry near it long enough to read the inscription. Another hill was devoted to the sayings of the jesters who were wont to amuse Kings and Queens of olden times. It was a tall, tall mound. It had a sickly look. Jones and the Doctor were not walled half the island before the former began to exhibit signs of weariness. The Doctor suggested a complete rest. Jones, however, added some future period, and Jones gladly assented. He had seen enough to know that he could never succeed as a humorist. Every idea that was likely to come to him had been exploited by others. He comes originally too well to seek fame by scribbling in the graveyard of Jokeland. Jones buried his latest born joke in the same shallow grave to his book of experiences and, next day, resumed work in his laboratory experimenting with his exhalant.

Origin of Ice Cream.

Baker's Helper.

The man who invented ice cream was a negro by the name of Jackson, and in the early part of the present century kept a small confectionery store. One day, quarrels which were cooled after being made by setting them on a cake of ice, were very fashionable, and Jackson conceived the idea of freezing them, which he did by placing the ingredients in a tin bucket and completely covering it with ice. Each day he prepared a quart, and was sold for it. It immediately became popular and he soon enlarged his store, and when he died left considerable fortune. A good many tried to follow his example, and one day he was hawking about the streets, being wheeled along very much as the "they-pokey" carts are now, but none of them succeeded in obtaining the flavor that Jackson had in his recipe.

SUMMING UP SOCIETY

A Russian Gives His Views of the American's Social Side of Life.

The Custom of Shaking Hands with Everybody—Doings in Society the Last Week.

The Contributors' Club, of Chicago, is one of the most exclusive literary organizations of that city. The members publish a magazine, which is filled with papers by members of the club. The subscribers are the members. For one of the numbers the members invited some of the notables who were in attendance at the world's fair to write, and the number is choice, indeed, for many reasons. The first article is "My Impressions of American," by Prince Serge Wolkonsky, and among other things which make an article of more than ordinary interest are two thoughts about American institutions. There are plenty of Americans who agree with him and had the same opinions before he came, though many of them have delayed expressing them till the foreigner came and uttered them, and now they say, "I think so too." He classified society as follows:

First Group—Monday afternoon. Beautiful homes, splendid furniture, exquisite dinners—soft-shell crabs and select company. Silver, flowers, crystal. Refined and charming manners. Evening dresses every eight. A tone of "informality" proclaimed and emphasized. Extensive ever-lasting chat. Oh, individuality, where, where hast thou gone?

Second Group—Trop in whenever you can. Always glad to see you. Do you like this book? Keep it; I don't want it. Come up with me to Mr. X's. You will meet my friends of the congress. Are you going? Just wait a moment; I will take my hat and see you home. I like to have a walk with you. Is not this a beautiful night? Let us start. Oh, we do not get to see much of nature here in Chicago.

Receptions—A social entertainment intended to kill all individual interest and leveling all individuality. No individual qualities can be displayed by those who compose the party. For anybody can stand in a row and shake hands with those who pass in front of personal qualities can be shown by those who are received, for there is no time given to show their individuality. The exclamation "Glad to meet you!" if it comes from the mouth of a person who is not a member of the party, will gradually become more and more skin-deep, and there is great danger in this from the social point of view. Characters disappear when they are not given an opportunity to show themselves. Give to the person who give the tone to society, invent something else if you want to bring people together with profit to one another. Invent something else than that monotonous handshaking with people whom you do not know and cannot learn to know, because there is no time, or with people whom you know and wish to talk to, but in which you must drop at every moment. Oh, deliver us from these "entertainments" where you say to ourselves, "Oh, what a bore!" and to others, "I am so glad to meet you!"

Orange Cups.

The fashion of giving presents at Easter time still holds its own. There are any quantity and variety of articles which the bookmakers and jewelers name as appropriate for the season. Among the very latest novelties, and one for which the master of transportation should have thanks for bringing the fruit so plentifully into the market, are the orange cups. These lovely cups are of noncolorable metal, resembling gold and silver, and they are of exquisite design. They have a graceful standard, and the cups hold a half ounce. To keep the orange from turning, and so that the orange spoon may make its trips necessarily, there are in each cup two prongs which pierce the orange and hold it. Other cups have a pin on each side of the cup, which may be run through the orange to hold it. In either style they are very pretty, and now that so many persons are eating oranges in this way—with a spoon—they are nice presents, even if no one can say they should be brought out just before Easter.

Personal Mention.

Out of several positions offered her, Mrs. W. W. Scott, formerly of this city, but now of New York, has accepted that of bookkeeper with the Second Collegiate Church, on Fifth avenue and Forty-eighth street. Mrs. Scott is one of the members of the same salary from this church as she was at the church, which now a newspaper editor at the corner of March 14 says of Miss Margaret Lemon, of this city: "Presently she will be the next soprano at the Second Collegiate Reformed Church, Harmon street, in honor of Miss Helen, who will be the soloist in the choir. All admirers must be in the superlative degree to properly describe Miss Lemon. Her voice is most beautiful, her style most artistic, and her manner most captivating. The church will not regret her choice. And she did not get the place through any special consideration, either. That's the fun of it!"
