But, on the steel at the nose, leaving the lead to flatten as it struck; when they had no file for this, they rubbed them against a rock. The humane theory of the small-caliber steel bullet is that when it strikes, unless it hits a vital spot, it does not mangle, but simply puts a man out of action, and that two more men take him to the rear, thus putting three out of action. But the theory struck, and if no bones are shattered, the flesh closes up with beautiful repair, and if antisepticized the recovery is surprisingly quick. The prompt appearance of these many slightly wounded men on the firing line is equivalent to a perpetual reinforcement; thus the campaign is prolonged indefinitely. The humane sentiment is neutral as to the victory of either side in wars between civilized armies, and prays only that the slaughter and destruction may cease as soon as possible. If in the early weeks of the South African struggle each man hit had been wholly disabled, if not killed outright, it is inconceivable that the British people would have permitted the war to go If, in the Philippines, each native struck by an American bullet had been unable to recover and soon appear in arms again, that unhappy struggle would have ended long ago. Consequently, there is much to be considered before making a wholesale condemnation of the "dumdum." War cannot be anything but the
