of local importance. He was an able man with a jury, but his forte was in the examination of witnesses. He did not browbeat, but he wanted to get the truth. He introduced witnesses to give the whole story.

Early in 1876 he told his personal friends that he wanted to go to the national House. The district was represented by a prosperous manufacturer who was glibly of his own party. He had been in the office for years in office, he had at his command the Portland custom house, with its sixty officers, and a large number of soldiers. Some of his friends urged that after another term the representative would retire. Mr. Reed entered the contest on no suggestions of compromise. That was the year to be elected to Congress and no other man had opposed two railroad loans asked of Portland to increase the business of the city. An organization was made, and as the result Mr. Reed was nominated by a small majority.

A HOT CAMPAIGN.

The campaign was a hot one. The Democrats nominated a popular man and the Republican whom Mr. Reed defeated in the convention permitted his name to be put on the ticket. Colonel Ingram, who had opened the Maine campaign, speaking in Reed's district. This seemed to recall the fact that years before Mr. Reed had been dropped from the membership of a strict Congregational Church for expressing liberal opinions. So the Democratic organs, connecting Reed with Ingersoll, Dubuque, Col. Reed, and the other organs in Congress by an atheist. Men went about the district who had probably asked the religious people if they, as Christian men, could vote for a man who did not believe in God. Mr. Reed pulled through with a fair plurality.

REED WINS A FRIEND.

Mr. Reed entered the Congress later that which had declared the election of General Hayes over Governor Tilden. It was a Democratic House and the result of the presidential election was a topic for partisan recrimination. Mr. Reed was a silent member, but he was "learning the ropes."
