THE LAST NUMBER'S EPIDEMIC

We have the pleasure to acknowledge the having received, from its author, the valuable pamphlet just published under the following title: History of the Epidemic Yellow Fever at New Orleans, La., 1853, by R. B. Sikes, M.D., one of the leading physicians to the New Orleans Health Board...

We are not medical officers, but this performance is brought to a certain degree, within the scope of our examination, by several facts: it is not intended for physicians alone; it involves, in connection with medical questions, others of a mixed nature, such as drainage, trade, temperature and the like; it concerns phenomena of the highest public interest; these phenomena are yet very ill understood, even by the medical faculty; and they are here treated popularly, as well as scientifically...

The great point to be aimed at, is, of course, the ascertaining the causes and origin of the disease, with a view to hindering its introduction or diminishing its violence. For what the cause truly may be of all the ill that has been in it is more especially true of the Yellow Fever, and of all other pestilential disorders, that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of remedy...

Doctor Fenner, therefore, but sets out as he should do, when he first of all directs his attention to the settling of the facts which accompanied the original appearance of the Fever here, last summer, and its subsequent ravages. He endeavors to show, in the first place, that all the precautions of sanitary police had been utterly neglected, by our municipal authorities, and that our city was, consequently, as fitly as it could be, a hot-bed to spread other voluntary nuisances of the seeds which the gardeners sowed there, in order to force them...

Next, he presents the anatomical history of the seasons that is, the monthly registers of the barometer, thermometer, wind, rain, snow, and winds, from January to October. He proceeds to the facts to the actual rise of the disease; and certainly seems to prove that it was not imported. Such is certainly the result of the evidence, so far as Dr. Fenner has collected it. We doubt neither his good-faith nor his intelligence; but we are too much accustomed to all the value of individual opinion, not to know that nothing can be rather than for a jury, however strong and seemingly decisive the testimony of the leading witness, to make up its verdict, in a case of life and death, before it has heard all. The very same facts may present a very different aspect, when completely sifted. In a word, let the public listen to Dr. Fenner with all possible candor and respect; but let it decide on nothing until it shall have had before it all the evidence and sifted it thoroughly. Then—if the fact be established (yet left undecided by much investigation) that Yellow Fever is never an imported malady...

Let us hold fast, then, to the title we have—quarantine without cleanliness and all the appliances of disinfection, within the sphere of the advancedness of the latter, there can be no question. Nay, the very adoption of the theory of non-importation in its largest sense, would inevitably imply that, in restricting ourselves to these merely alone, we should omit nothing whatever that can carry to the utmost their efficacy. Powerful as these reasons are, they are rendered overwhelming when we consider that drainage, cleanliness, ventilation and the employment of disinfecting agents are not only likely to prevent Yellow Fever, but certain to diminish its violence and equally to lessen that of cholera and all other diseases of our climate; and while checking these and contagion and systems generally, to add almost as much to the comfort as to the health of the citizen and the journeyer. Nor must we forget to remind our people that these measures of sanitary precaution have not become of the very last consequence to all the material interests of New Orleans. If we are again, at last, a brief interval, to be decimated by a mortality like that of last year, it is in vain to imagine that Commerce will not suffer, and that our city and luxurious capital that look into the rear from which it rose...

For all these reasons, we think it the duty of the Press, not only here but throughout the State, to urge the public attention to this great matter, and to point out until it be put in train for the rapid and most vigorous accomplishment. The proposition already introduced into the legislature by General Cronan seems to us (as we sometimes since intimated) the one of which the whole object may be made to grow. Headlines, we think Doctor Fenner for his slight contribution towards putting in this in possession of a large body of facts in this difficult history. We hope that others of the many learned physicians whom we possess, will hasten in like manner to do us well of our town and to clear up the mystery of this terrible disease.

Dr. Fenner's theory is a New York. Specimens of the spring trade begin to be visible, especially among the dry goods dealers. Some large articles have been had recently, all of which have been well attended, but principally by city buyers, and not by country or foreign buyers. The market is quiet, and the price of goods is generally steady. The weather is pleasant, and the season is progressing favorably. The city is well supplied with provisions, and the public are well served. The government is active in its measures to protect the health of the people, and the press is diligent in its efforts to disseminate useful information. The overall state of affairs is one of quietude and order, with a slight improvement in the economic conditions.

NEW YORK, Feb. 10.—The Collins steamer Pacific has arrived here bringing dates from Liverpool of the 25th of January—four days later than the accounts brought by the Arabia. Her arrival reports a moderate amount in the cotton market, at Liverpool, with sales for the three weeks ending for the week ending 11th of January, including 100,000 bales for speculation and 100,000 for export. Prices were further advanced to 10 1/2 and according to the circular of Milligan, Brien & Co. the market closed at the following quotations: Orleans 12 1/2, middling 12 1/2, Orleans 12 1/2, middling 12 1/2, and middling 12 1/2.

The popular excitement at St. Petersburg was intense, and apprehensions were felt that the Emperor would be compelled to declare war. It was reported that General Mordukhai-Novitsky had been ordered to march to the frontier. There was a rumor that several thousand Russians had crossed the Danube. No more battles had yet taken place on the Danube or in Asia, but there was considerable movement on the former.
