WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE

Washington, Feb. 29, 1859. Messrs. Editors: There was nothing so tangled, betwixt, beset, and beset before. I have delayed my letter for a day in hopes that the Congressional chaos would resolve itself into something like order and enable me to do my duty by giving you a readable and intelligible account of a week of the most perplexed proceedings that ever occurred in the history of the country.

Perhaps I failed the method of the Herald's shell process and divide my theme into several heads. I may probably get along. Here then are the heads: The slavery debate in the Senate—the reports of the Investigating Committee on the late and subsequent consideration of the Post-office Appropriation bill—and finally the Cuban discussion continued nearly all of last night in the Senate.

The slavery debate, which sprang up in the Senate and lasted day and night for two days, took the public completely by surprise. But it was no haphazard event; it was premeditated all along. Hile of New Hampshire introduced an amendment repealing the restriction clause in the English bill—that clause which forbids the admission of Kansas into the Union until by actual census it is ascertained that she has the requisite population to entitle her to one member of Congress according to the present apportionment.

Douglas had to bear the brunt of the fire, and he bore it gallantly, defending himself successfully against Brown, Davis, Hunter, Sill, and the rest of the Southern Senators, and assisted only by the feeble power of Pugh and Bigler. A gentleman who is no admirer of Douglas gave vent to the common opinion when he said, "I despise the man, but I can not admire his pluck and ability."

What is to become of the country. Heaven only knows. There is no longer a party to be trusted. Indeed there is none in existence. There is no man, any one of men, who enjoy the confidence of the nation. We have no truly great man. Some there are who have many of the elements of greatness, but in one or more essential they are lacking. It may be that the country is passing through a period of great trial, but it is not to be predicted that the destruction of his party, and the ruin of his country, which is less than six months in the future.
