SOUTH OF THE NORTH.

...with a sabre. The sum of four hundred and eighty dollars was found on his person, which was placed with the Paymaster for safe keeping.

Ed. Copic states that he is from Iowa. He made the acquaintance of Brown last winter in Iowa, where Brown told him of this scheme and asked him to join the expedition. Copic states as follows: "We were to be well paid for our time and treeble. We never made a direct bargain as to how much we were to receive. Old man Brown was not to pay us; but I don't know who was. The rifles were furnished by the Massachusetts Aid Society. They were first sent to Kansas, but the excitement having died away, they were of no use and Brown got the rifles for this expedition. They were sent from Kansas to Chambersburg, Franklin county; they were then hauled from there to Brown's house by a man who lives in Greencastle. I don't know who made the pikes or picks. I have said all the prayers I have to say, and am ready to die."

This man was in excellent spirits, perfectly unconcerned in regard to his fate, and said that he "was ready to swing, if the laws of the country ordered it."

A mulatto was severely wounded and taken prisoner. His fate is thus related:

The wounded man taken happened to be the mulatto, and our informant, for the purpose of eliciting some information, went to that man and rested his dying frame on his arm. He repeatedly asked him his name and the origin of the outbreak, but all he could elicit at first from him was a roll of his large eye and a shake of his head. At length, seeing that he had not long to live, he declared, in all sincerity, that the rebels only numbered at first nineteen, but that, as all the slaves were expecting to get, reinforcements. Whilst our informant was engaged in his interrogatories, one of the infuriated citizens came up and snatched the dying man from his arms, and with one gash of a knife cut his throat from ear to ear. The mulatto was a good looking fellow, and about twenty-five years of age. To such a hight had the indignation risen, that before his throat was cut, a female came up and struck him a blow in the face.

Another rebel by the name of Stevens was described by our informant as a "mighty fine looking fellow." As he lay on his bed last night wounded, a person came to him and had his rifle leveled to end his days, when somebody came and pushed the gun aside. He was about thirty years of age, and told those around him that if he died, to telegraph to his father in Connecticut "that he died in the attempt to commit high treason against the State of Virginia." He was suffering from a wound in the side. He told those around him that if he lived till daylight the people would hang him,—and they had already erected the gallows,—and were only waiting the dawn of day to execute their purposes.

The Richmond Enquirer has the following from its special reporter:

On Governor Wise reaching the Arsenal, old Brown received him with the utmost composure, though evidently suffering much from his wounds. He said, "Well, Governor, I suppose you think me a depraved criminal. Well, sir, we have our opinions of each other." The remark was made with no disrespect whatever. The Governor replied, "You are in the hands of the State, and I have questions to ask, which you can answer or not as you choose." Brown answered every question and made a full confession, which will be published hereafter. Brown said he was conscious that he was in the hands of the law and was prepared to meet his fate; that as far as he himself and those already is custody were concerned, he had no concealments whatever to make; that he had been mistaken in his calculations about assistance from others, otherwise he would have given much more trouble. He said that the whole plot was well contrived and arranged as far back as 1856, and that he had reason to expect assistance of from 3000 to 5000 men; that he looked for aid from every State (Virginia included). Upon being asked if any negroes of either in or out of Harper's Ferry were pledged to him, he declined answering. But upon reflection he framed an answer in these words: "From my visits and associations and inquiries about here, I have a right to expect the aid of from three to five thousand men." Being interrogated very closely by Governor Wise as to the names of those who were pledged to him and from whom, Brown said they were shipped from Connecticut to Chambersburg, Pa., direct to "J. Smith & Sons," in two boxes, and were hauled to Kennedy's farm in Maryland (the rendezvous), by drivers who knew nothing of what they contained.

A Provisional Constitution was found on one of the rioters (Stevens) and shown to Brown, to know if it was genuine. Upon hearing the preamble read he pronounced it genuine, and confessed that he was the author chiefly, though the document was amended in their Convention. He declined answering questions that might implicate others until yesterday, when he said he hadkfixed upon Harper's Ferry in 1858 as the point to commence his operations against the Southern States; that he had fully examined its strength, ascertained the number of men in charge of it and the probabilities of taking it; said he united the Kennedy Farm in Maryland about two years ago for his two sons, Oliver and Watson, under the name of Smith, to secrete the weapons, etc., and had continued, from time to time, to add to the stores. Brown said he would have succeeded had he held Phelps' train at Harper's Ferry; thinks he would then have been able to hold the place long enough to inspire confidence in him and his plans, and then his promised support would have come up.

A Mr. Moreton McGee, from Kansas, was arrested on suspicion of being connected with the insurgents, and upon questioning Brown as to the connection of McGee with him, he asked for his name. Upon being told that it was Moreton McGee, he broke forth in the most bitter denunciation of McGee as a pro-slavery man in Kansas. McGee was forthwith discharged. McGee then went out in pursuit of Cooke, and brought in many of the captured arms, etc.

Like Coppie and Stevens, Brown had no apologies to make, but justified his conduct from the beginning to the end.

The Governor asked Brown if they had taken the Government money. He replied with indignation that money was not his object; he had no object but to take slaves from their masters; they had money in abundance; and though they searched a passenger in the train for arms, who had in his possession $10,000, they did not molest the money.

The letters found on Brown's farm showed that the insurgents were in receipt of money from other parties. Brown's manner to Gov. Wise was most dignified and respectful. He claimed equality as to character and motive, and complained throughout of the treatment visited upon him; that while humanity had governed his own conduct towards his prisoners, he had been treated as a ruffian and a brute.

A discrepancy exists between Mr. Washington and Mr. Brown as to the surrender of the latter. Brown says he surrendered before the marines entered the engine-house. Mr. Washington says Brown had a musket in his hands when he was struck by Lieut. Green of the marines. Brown complained that his flag of truce had not been respected—his son having been shot while bearing the flag. Brown's son was not shot by the soldiers, but by a citizen.

The Carnivoria of India and China.—M. Castelnau has sent a communication to the French Academy on the carnivoria of India and China. Lions are very numerous there; and the country swarms with jaguars and tigers of the largest size, who live mainly upon human flesh. There are towns in certain localities surrounded by forests and jungles, which furnish as many as 700 victims a year to the tigers, which establish themselves in these places as a hunter does near his park of game. M. Castelnau gives a singular story of their daring. Forty or fifty men had built a village on an island. A band of tigers crossed the water, attacked them, and, in spite of a desperate resistance, carried off twenty. They generally kill their men by lying in wait, and letting them pass, then leaping upon their backs they stun or kill them by a stroke of the paw. They then open the veins of the neck, and suck the blood of their victim, and return in an hour or two to eat the flesh cold. They are well acquainted with the hours at which travelers usually pass. The English have failed to diminish their number by a bounty of $60 per head.

Hissing an Actor by Steam.—A few nights ago, Mr. B. G. Rogers, the comedian at the Richmond theater, was much annoyed by a sibilant sound, which saluted the tympana of his ears whenever he made his appearance on the stage. It seemed to proceed from the parquette, and was regarded by Mr. R. as an utterance of disapprobation against himself. He was unconscious of having given cause for offense, and complained to Mr. Phillips, the stage manager, of the supposed expression of censure. Mr. P. came forward to the footlights and addressed the audience. He desired to know what offense Mr. R. had committed to provoke the hisses of any one among the audience. A gentleman in the parquette suggested that the "hissing" proceeded from a locomotive standing on the railroad track in front of the theaters and caused by the escape of steam from the boiler. The correctness of the explanation at once occurred to Mr. Phillips, and he retired with all the grace he could, amid the laughter of the audience. Mr. Rogers is perhaps the only actor, living or dead, who has been hissed from the stage by steam. This is a great country.

A Russian Beauty.—The wife of the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, at present visiting Constantinople, has created a sensation. She speaks English and French fluently, and her manners correspond with her character. She has a fine form, shoulders faultless, person tall and graceful, dazzling white complexion, with blue eyes and light brown hair, arrayed in the most simple and tasteful style. Her taste in dress is the theme of universal encomium.

A returned Pike's Peak wagon passed our office, says the Des Moines Citizen, a few days since, with these words rudely daubed on the cover: "Pizzle—ask no questions." That told the whole story as well as it could be told in half an hour, and saved the time of the travelers, who already felt that they had wasted too much.
