Scientific Agriculture.

Most of the Southern States are lamentably deficient in the application of science to agriculture. Nature has been so prodigal in her gifts to the South, of a fertile soil and fruitful soil, that the planters and farmers in our favored section too generally depend solely upon her efforts, and neglect to call to their aid those scientific principles which have lately been brought to the notice of the world. Experience has taught the advantage of using manure, and the necessity of using it in a judicious manner. It is the duty of the farmer to use it in a judicious manner, and to use it in a judicious manner.

It is a general principle, that the progress in agriculture has not advanced in any of our States, since the year 1800.
