STATE CREDIT.

An exchange says: It is a remarkable fact that Kentucky bonds are selling in New York market, on the receipt of the news of the Union party in that State.

We don't consider it at all "remarkable." It was a result precisely such as might have been expected. The financiers of Wall street knew exactly what they were about when they refused to buy Kentucky bonds at the same rates they had been selling at before.

They know that by Kentucky's remaining in the Union she thereby becomes responsible for her proportion of the enormous national debt that old Union and Lincoln are now creating. They know that she must pay her share of the annual direct tax that is to be collected from all the States "loyal to the Union."

They know that by the establishment of the blockade, Kentucky is cut off from the Southern market for her hemp, her breadstuffs, her cattle and mules, and everything else she has been used to export to that market.

They know that the credit of any State is in proportion of its ability to pay—and if Kentucky becomes responsible for an oppressive national debt at the same time that she loses her principal source of revenue, it does not take a shrewd Wall street operator long to arrive at a conclusion as to the probable future value of her bonds.

But while the success of the Union party at the late election in that State has depreciated her bonds, the hands of the Confederate States have advanced in value since the victory at Manassas. Just in proportion as the chances for success increase, so do the market prices of our Southern securities. It is true, they fall heavily at the beginning of the war. But they are now gradually going up every day.

They fall because the Northern holders could not expect payment, even of the interest, if the North was making war upon a State that was making war upon the North. But now that the North has taken them from their pockets, and is now gradually buying them up, they are again rising.

They are rising because the Northern holders are now buying them up. They are rising because the Northern holders are now buying them up.

They are rising because the Northern holders are now buying them up. They are rising because the Northern holders are now buying them up.
