New Orleans Normal School.

This excellent institution has been in successful operation during the past two years. There are about 80 pupils now in actual attendance, many of them graduates of high schools or private institutions, others possessing qualifications of scholarship, as shown by certificates from committees on teachers or higher examining boards.

The school is divided into junior and senior classes. The latter numbers about forty, who are expected to graduate some time in the month of May next. The course of study is a liberal one, and of such a nature as to fit the students for the teaching vocation. An intention to teach is a requisite for admission to the school.

The elementary studies of the schools are reviewed, under experienced teachers, who employ the best methods of communicating knowledge to the young. The history of education forms a distinct department of the school, and the different systems of instruction which have marked the progress of the centuries are explained.

The sessions of the school are on Saturdays, from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M., and on the afternoon of each public school day, from 4 to 6 P. M. A number of the members of the school are actively engaged in public or private schools, and several come from Jefferson City. The attendance is good, and the discipline is strictly enforced.

There are eight professors and lady teachers connected with the school, who are all of the highest attainments in their respective professions, and occupying prominent positions in connection with the public schools. There are also two additional teachers of the modern languages, who are not included in the regular faculty, but whose classes are formed in the school.

Before the late war the Normal School was aided by annual appropriations from the State, with occasional assistance from the city. Since the war the State has not been able to extend any aid. The city school board has never had sufficient funds at command to employ teachers at stated salaries, or assume such pecuniary obligations as would place the school on the same footing with the city schools. Every encouragement, however, has been extended to the enterprise. The fine building on Burgundy street, when not required for the Central High School, is furnished and repaired at the expense of the city. There is a standing committee of the board, of which E. Bernades, Esq., has recently been appointed chairman, charged with the general administration of the school, and the reports of the committee from time to time have exhibited the efficient and successful working of the school.

The services of the professors and teachers have been given gratuitously—a fact which speaks much in their praise. An appropriation of two thousand dollars for the encouragement of the school was made last year, by the city school board, and the remainder of the sum has been given to the school for the purchase of books and apparatus. This amount ($2000) has been largely reduced, but all the pecuniary assistance that the school has been thus far derived from the Peabody bequest. The money so obtained has been paid to the remainder of the school, under the supervision of the city school board, W. O. Rogers, Esq., is charged with the supervision, also, of the Normal School, under the general principles of the school board.

The influence and of the Normal School in connection with our general system of public education can be easily shown. Teaching, like any other calling and profession, requires a special preparation. There must be not only a knowledge of the facts contained in the text books, but an ability to render their application to the greatest benefit, both in the instruction and conduct of the young. Voluntary associations for these ends, are always more efficient than formal and compulsory institutes, where certain precise essays and carefully prepared debates are the chief agencies for eliciting the talents and industry of the young. A school of young and zealous teachers, directed by experienced and capable professors, is destined to impart an important influence, wherever preference is given in the selection of a professor and teacher. Only the best of the young, and those who are not content with the ordinary, but who are anxious to display both preparation and aptitude for their calling.

We think there should be a primary department, or "school of practice," connected with the Normal School, for those who are not content with the ordinary, but who are anxious to display both preparation and aptitude for their calling.
