THAT BLUE BROCADE.

YOU never saw a lovelier piece of goods, Aunt Judith! Just the most delicate blue that is almost a green, all shot with the most delightful wavering silver lights. Can't I have it for the dance at the opening of the Cosmopolitan club?"

"No," returned Aunt Judith. "I've no money to waste on new gowns."

"But surely you do not wish me to look shabby at this very grand affair."

"Fear that last new gown you got at Christmas—the heliotrope chiffon."

"Oh—that!" disdainfully. "I've worn it half a dozen times, and chiffon does look so dreadfully mussy if it isn't fresh."

Mrs. Risby rose. She was middle-aged, stout, red-faced. She wore a black alpaca dress, a long, old-fashioned cable of a watch-chain, and a cameo brooch the size of a small sauce dish.

"Stay at home, then," she advised. "You forget," Letha Maturin reminded her aunt, "that the catch of the season is to be present. Willis Vifquaine is young, rich, handsome. I think his place—Rosemere—is one of the most beautiful in this part of the country. He has been abroad ever since he graduated. All the girls are crazy to prove the conquering heroine. If I could only have a new gown of that blue brocade, I haven't a doubt in the world I could reign at Rosemere, if I chose."

Mrs. Risby's eyes twinkled with amusement. "And what gives you such confidence, my dear?"

"Well, in the first place, his father and mine were partners in that great store that Willis now owns—the one we might now be deriving an income from, if poor papa had not gambled away his interest in it. The fact that our fathers were so nearly associated in business, and such warm friends, would make him find me particularly interesting."

"Well? And the second reason?"

"Oh, the second and all the others are—myself."

"There is no denying, my dear, that the second is very charming, indeed," laughed the old lady, as she took herself away.

Letha stood several minutes looking at her reflection in the long cheval glass. She nodded and smiled. Charming in truth!

"It's a shame!" she declared. "I can't set my good-looks off with that blue brocade!"

"It is, indeed," echoed a sympathetic voice—a sweet voice, and low.

An arm stole around her waist. A little curly brown head nestled against her shoulder. Two dark, brilliant eyes also regarded the face in the glass with admiration.
