B. H. Millik, Washington, C. H. writes: "My grandfather, George C. Davis, belonged to Co. H, 9th Ky., who called themselves the Foot Cavalry. He was killed at the battle of Shiloh, Stone River, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, Buzzards Roost, Kenesaw Mountain, Sugar Valley, Peach Tree Creek, Siege of Atlanta, Jonesboro, Lovejoy, and followed Brass through Kentucky.

"He wants to know if any of his old comrades remember the time they went on a scouting expedition after some bushwhackers somewhere in the vicinity of Bowling Green, Ky. They captured the rebels just as they were preparing to eat dinner, which they had laid out on boxes; but the boys in blue got the dinner!"

"Why don't some one of the 9th Ky. write to The National Tribune? Grandpa would like to hear from his old comrades. He says: 'I'm 81 and shortly stay with us as long as possible.'"

"I wish every old soldier in the land could take The National Tribune. It is the best soldier published in the United States. I don't see how we could get along without it."

"I wish some one who reads The National Tribune would send me the song entitled 'A Soldier's Daughter.'"

"I wish some one of the 68th Ind. would write to The National Tribune. My mother, Mrs. E. G. Leighton, in the town of that regiment, died a color-bearer, and died in 1862. His name was James D. Hamilton. He enlisted from Owensville, Ind."

Usher West, also, was well mounted; all unserviceable or weak animals had been abandoned. West rode far at the front of the slow stretch of the wagon. He rode fast; four holsters hung at his saddle. Usher West, the extreme front, was more than a mile in advance of Morgan.

Mosby rode in no one place; his great horse carried him toward the front, where he would urge the men to steady work; then he would halt and, as the wagon moved, the teamsters to drive till their teams dropped dead; when the teams had passed, again he galloped to the front, ever pressing the fight, making rode again to the rear, the way which he knew he could defend at least until darkness should enable him to reward his men; after, dispersion could not be commanded too soon.
