Southern Humor.
Henry Watterson writes in the April Century, upon the "Oddities of Southern Life," introducing the subject as follows:
Every people is known by his jokes. Men are less restrained in their mirth, and give therein the largest play of their likes and dislikes. The humor of Harry Fielding, Thackeray tells us, is wonderfully wise and defective: it flashes upon a rogue and lightens up a rascal like a policeman's lantern. The same may be said of the humor of Rabelais, though the objects of its ridicule are not always cheats and scamps. The difference between opera bouffe and Anglo-Saxon farce represents the difference between the life of the French and the life of the English. With the Americans it is not the snob and the husband who are satirized; our domestic jocosity embraces chiefly the small boy, the widow and the mother-in-law, reserving for its most palpable hits the bully, the visionary speculator, the gamester and the commercial agent. Thus American humor may be divided into two classes—that which relates to fighting and that which relates to money. In the South the general classification grows still narrower, gaining, however, in whimsicality and local color what it lacks in breadth.

There can be no mistaking the original of the old story of the traveler who asked a Mississippian whether it was worth his while to carry a pistol, and was told: "Well, stranger, you mout move around here more'n a year an' never need a pistol; but ef you should happen to need one, you'd need it powful." Equally characteristic is the record of a well-known Tennessee case. The principal witness for the common-wealth testified that he was sent to get a fresh pack of cards, that he got them, and returning sat down in the grass. Here he balked in his testimony, and would go no further. At last, after cross-questioning and coaxing had been exhausted, the Judge threatened him with a fine and imprisonment, where-upon he said: "Please, your Honor, if I must tell you how I drapped in the jimson weeds, I suppose I must. It was just, your Honor, to look over the kerds, and mark the bowers." The following incidents no less reflect the local color of the antebellum days: Two Kentuckians went to settle their bill at a hotel in Boston. There being a dispute about the amount, one of them grew angry and began to swear, when the other said: "Remember John, who you are. Remember you are a Kentuckian. Pay the bill and shoot the scoundrel!"
