The Daily Bulletin.

THURSDAY, NOV. 2, 1882.

A victim to the cruelty of a mother-in-law appeared in a London Police Court recently, asking the Court's interference in the matter. Mr. Lushington, the complainant, stated that one evening she paid him a visit and presently turned him out of doors. Upon hearing of so uncommon a feat the magistrate was stricken with astonishment and exclaimed, "What! did she eject you from your own house?" The applicant for protection replied that she had certainly done so, adding that he had, as a matter of fact, been glad to get out into the street safe and sound. "So would you, sir," he added, "be only too glad to run if you had such a mother-in-law as I've got. Only last night she said she would 'spifflicate me,' and I know she would have done so if she could only have got hold of me. After I had escaped her she turned round and thrashed her daughter, my wife, and then she made my own mother, who happened to be in the house, fly for her life. She has sworn that she will murder the lot of us one of these days and I fear she will keep her oath." The London Telegraph, from which this story is taken, comments upon the affair: "Beyond doubt a mother-in-law whose view of her duties and responsibilities in that character prompts her to expel her son-in-law from his domicile by force, to administer a sound beating to her daughter, and to terrify that matron's mother-in-law into precipitate and ignominious flight, all in the course of an after-dinner call; is an exceptionally energetic specimen of her class. We all know what the man is who, save in the way of kindness, would lay his hand upon a mother-in-law; but surely the termagant, whose exploits are recorded in police annals, should be regarded as one not included within the rule."
