CHAPTER III.

I sat up with the water trickling down my back. The cry was repeated, out of the west.

I knew the woods, but night altered the most familiar places. I made directly toward the woman's voice, which guided me more plainly than left off running as my ear detected that she was only in perplexity. She called at intervals, imperatively, but not in continuous screams. She was a white woman, for no squaw would punish her discomfort.

Climbing over rocks and windfalls I came against a solid log wall and heard the woman talking in a very pretty chatter the other side of it. She only left off talking to call for help, and left off calling for help to scold and laugh again. These was a man imprisoned with her, and they were speaking English, a language I did not then understand. But what had happened to them was very plain. They had wandered into a pen built by hunters to trap bears and could not find the bush masked and winding opening, but were traveling around the walls.

I found my way to the opening and whistled. At once the woman ceased her chatter and drew in her breath, and they both asked me a question that needed no interpretation. I told them where they were, and the woman began talking at once in my own tongue and spoke it as well as I could myself.

"In a bear pen? George, he says we are in a bear pen! Take us out, dear chief, before the bear family arrive home from their ball. I don't know whether you are a chief or not, but most Indians are. My nurse was a chief's daughter. Where are you? I can't see anything but hunks of blackness."

I took her horse by the bridle and led him and so got both the riders outside. They had no tinder, and neither had I, and all of us groped for the way by which they had come to the bear pen. The young man spurred his horse in every direction and turned back unable to get through.

Though we could not see one another, I knew that both the adventurers were young and that they expected to be called to severe account for the lawless act they were committing. The girl, talking English or French or Mohawk almost in one breath, took the blame upon herself and made light of the boy's self reproaches.

She laughed and said, "My father thinks I am with Miss Chantry, and Miss Chantry thinks I am with my father. He will blame her for letting me ride with George Croghan to meet him and lose the way and so get into the bear pen. And she will blame my father, and your dearest Annabel will let the Count de Chaumont and Miss Chantry fight it out. It is not an affair for youth to meddle with, George."

Having her for interpreter the boy and I consulted. I might have led him back to our hunting camp, but it was a hard road for a woman and an impossible one for horses. There was no inhabited house nearer than De Chaumont's own. He decided they must retreat to the road by which they had come into the bear pen, and gladly accepted my offer to go with him; dismounting and leading Annabel de Chaumont's horse while I led his. We passed over rotten logs and through black tangles, the girl bending to her saddle bow, unwearied and full of laughter. It was plain that he could not find any outlet, and falling behind with the cumbered horse he let me guide the party.

I do not know by what instinct I felt my way, conscious of slipping between the wild citizens of that vast town of trees. But we finally reached a clearing and saw across the open space a lighted cabin. Its sashless windows and defective chimneys were gilded with the yellow light that comes from a glowing hearth.

"I know this place!" exclaimed Annabel. "It is where the Saint-Michels used to live before they went to my father's settlement at Le Rayville. George, why don't you go and knock on the door?"

It was not necessary, for the door opened and a man appeared, holding his violin by the neck. He stepped out to look around the cabin at some horses fastened there, and saw and halted us.

I was not sorry to be allowed to enter, for I was tired to exhaustion and sat down on the floor away from the fire. The man looked at me suspiciously, though he was ruddy and good natured. But he bent quite over before De Chaumont's daughter and made a flourish with his hand in receiving young Croghan. There were in the cabin with him two women and two little girls, and a Canadian servant like a fat brown bear came from the rear of the house to look at us and then went back to the horses.

All the women began to speak, but Annabel de Chaumont could talk faster than the four other combined; so they knew our plight before we learned that they were the Grignon and Tank families, who were going into the west to find settlement and had made the house their camp for one night. The Dutch maid, dark and round eyed, and the flavon little Grignon had respect for their elders and held their tongues while Miss Tank and Miss Grignon spoke, but Annabel de Chaumont was like a grove of sparrows. The world seemed swarming with young maids. The travelers were mere children, while the count's daughter was starting as an angel. Her clothing fitted her body like an exquisite sheath. I do not know what it was, but it made her look as slim as a dragon fly. Her white and rose pink face had a high arched nose, and was proud and saucy. She wore her hair beaten out like mist, with rich curly shreds hanging in front of her ears to her shoulders. She shook her head to set her hat straight, and turned her eyes in rapid smiling sweeps. I knew as well then as I ever did afterward that she was bound to befool every man that came near her.

There were only two benches in the cabin, but it was floored and better made than our hunting lodges. The temporary inmates and their guests sat down in a long row before the fire. I was glad to make a pillow of a saddle near the wall, and watch their backs, as an outsider. Miss de Chaumont absorbed all eyes and all attention. She told about a ball, to which she had ridden with her governess and servants a three days' journey and from which all the dancers were riding back a three days' journey to join in another ball at her father's house. With the hospitality which made Le Ray de Chaumont's manor the palace of the wilderness as it existed then, she invited the hosts who sheltered her for the night to come to the ball and stay all summer. And they lamented that they could not accept the invitation, being obliged to hurry on to Albany, where a larger party would give them escort on a long westward journey.

The head of the house took up his bow, as if musing on the ball, and Annabel de Chaumont wriggled her feet faster and faster. Tiresias as thisle-down that rolls here and there at the will of the wind, up she sprang and began to dance. The children watched her spellbound. I sat up to watch her, and she roared me for the first time by firelight.

"Look at that boy! He has been hurt—the blood is running down his cheek!" she cried. "I thought he was an Indian—and he is white!"

I wanted the woman to leave me alone, and told them my head had been broken two days before and was nearly well. The mothers, too keen to wash and bandage to let me escape, opened a saddle pack and tore good linen.

George Croghan stood by the chimney, slim and tall and handsome. His head and face were long, his hair was of a sunny color and his mouth corners were shrewd and good natured. I liked him the moment I saw him. Younger in years than I, he was older in wit and manly carriage. While he looked on it was hard to have Mme. Tank seize my head in her hands and examine my eyebrow. She next took my wrists, and, not satisfied, stripped up the right sleeve and exposed a crescent shaped scar, one of the rare vaccination marks of those days. I did not know what it was. Her unlimbed dark eyes drew the brows together so that a pucker came between them. I looked at Croghan and wanted to exclaim: "Help yourself! Anybody may handle me!"

"Ursule Grignon!" she said sharply, and Mme. Grignon answered: "Eh, what, Katarina?"

"This is the boy."
 "But what boy?"
 "The boy I saw on the ship."
 "The one who was sent to America!"—Mme. Tank put up her hand, and the other stopped.

 "But that was a child," Mme. Grignon then objected.
 "Nine years ago. He would be about eighteen now."
 "How old are you?" they both put to me.

Remembering what my father had told Dr. Chantry, I was obliged to own that I was about eighteen. Annabel de Chaumont sat on the lowest log of the chimney with her feet on a bench and her chin in her hand, interested to the point of silence. Something in her eyes made it very galling to be over-

"Ursule Grignon!" she said sharply, hauled an dhive my blemishes enumerated before her and Croghan. What had uplifted me to Mme. de Ferrier's recognition now mocked, and I found it hard to submit. It would not go well with the next stranger who declared he knew me by my scars.

"What do they call you in this country?" inquired Mme. Tank.
 "I said my name was Lazarre Williams."
 "It is not!" she said in an undertone shaking her head.
 "I made bold to ask with some warmth what my name was then, and she whispered, "Poor child!"

It seemed that I was to be pitted in any case. In dim self knowledge I saw that the core of my resentment was her treating me with commiseration. Mme. de Ferrier had not treated me so.
 "You live among the Indians?" Mme. Tank resumed.
 "The fact was evident."
 "Have they been kind to you?" I said they had.
 Mme. Tank's young daughter edged near her and inquired in a whisper: "Who is he, mother?"
 "Who is he, mother?"
 "Hush!" answered Mme. Tank.

The head of the party laid down his violin and bow, and explained to us.
 "Mme. Tank was maid of honor to the queen of Holland before reverse overtook her. She knows court secrets."
 "But she might at least tell us," coaxed Annabel. "If this Mohawk is a Dutchman."
 Mme. Tank said nothing.

"What could happen in the court of Holland? The Dutch are slow coaches.
