Short Stories For Evening Hours

AT THE CLUB IN CEYLON

The little clubhouse of the Lantana district of Ceylon presented an animated scene. It was "Teovall" and all the Tamil coolies on the surrounding tea estate were busily engaged in celebrating their great festival, as was evidenced by the incessant tom-tomming which arose from their line of huts, and the thriving tavern which the keeper of the arrack trade was doing.

As the club Secretary hurried past the tennis court he caught sight of a girl who had just ridden up and was standing by her horse's head waiting for her housekeeper. "Good morning, Miss Moore," he said, as he approached. "Come and let me introduce you to your partner in the tennis tournament. We have just finished the draw. Ah, here is the very man," he continued, beckoning to a tall man who was passing. "Miss Moore—Maj. Bradshaw."

The girl stared aghast for a moment, but quickly recovered herself, though the warm flush which rose to her cheek betrayed her attitude of sangfroid. "Oh, you have met before," said the Secretary, catching her look. "So much the better. I must be off. Hope the weather will keep up."

He hurried off and left the two together. When two young people have been engaged and have decided to break it off, subsequent meetings are apt to prove a little awkward even after the lapse of such a long period of time as five years.

A faint reddening under the deep tan of his skin showed that Bradshaw also found the situation a little trying, but he smiled frankly as he raised his hat. "How do you do?" he said. "I didn't know you were in Ceylon." The girl laughed.

"And I was equally ignorant with regard to you," she said. "I am staying with my cousin, Mrs. Deare, whose husband is a planter on Gangoo's estate. This is the explanation of my presence here."

"I am staying with Jones on Parmetia," said Bradshaw, "only a couple of miles from Gangoo. Funny I hadn't heard you were here. Every one knows all about every one else here, but I only arrived two days ago, so perhaps that explains it."

The girl felt that the situation was decidedly awkward. Five years ago, in Southsea, she had met young Bradshaw, then a subaltern, and after a short acquaintance they had become engaged. She was in her first season, and at 18 life is not a serious problem. He was arbitrary and self-confident, and resented what he was pleased to call her flirtations with other men, so the quarrel came and the engagement was broken off. It was a little embarrassing to meet again suddenly like this, but she must make the best of it.

"I hope the rain will keep off," she said, taking refuge in that excellent subject, the weather.

"Yes," he replied, "we shan't get much tennis if it rains. I am afraid you have been unlucky in the draw, for my tennis has not improved."

She stole a glance at him, and found his gaze steadily on her.

"Your regiment is stationed in India, isn't it?" she asked.

"Yes," he said. "I am here on three months' sick leave. Had a slight go of enteric, and the doctors thought it wasn't bad enough to send me home, so I came here to pick up after it. Jones is an old school friend of mine, and asked me to stay with him."

"I see they are starting play," she said. "I must get ready, else we shall get into trouble."

She tripped off to the clubhouse, and soon reappeared in a short white skirt and tennis shoes.

The clouds drifted slowly away, and the glaring hot sun poured down on the little gathering, but the couples, undismayed by the heat, played tennis vigorously. Maj. Bradshaw had evidently not overstated the case when he belittled his powers as a tennis player, for he and his partner succumbed ignominiously to couple after couple in the tournament.

Miss Moore did not seem to take her want of success or the shortcomings of her partner very much to heart.

Perhaps it was not quite by coincidence that they sat next each other at the substantial mid-day breakfast. He had improved, she thought. Hard lines had taken away the full freshness of boyhood from his face, and his hair was a little scanty over the temples, but the expression had changed for the better.

As she emerged from the clubhouse in boots and habit once more, she found him waiting, and advanced to bid him good-by.

"I am coming with you," she said smiling. "Mrs. Deare has had to go on, and she asked me to see you safely home, as it is on my way."

"I shall never let you go again," he said.

"I do not want to go again, ever," she said.

A few minutes later a very wet but ridiculously happy couple reached Gango's bungalow. Harry Deare met them on the veranda, and was not a little surprised at the calm indifference with which they treated the probable fate of their horses—Alan Gordon in the Lady's Realm.
