WEST VIRGINIA MEMORANDUM

Celebration this month by West Virginia centering at Wheeling, but State-wide in its scope, of 50 years of Statehood will attract attention to the remarkable progress made in half a century. It is impossible to compare statistically West Virginia in 1863 with the portion of Virginia which constituted West Virginia in 1863. But the progress in that period is indicated in comparing as in the accompanying table, the whole of Virginia of 1860 and West Virginia of this year. This shows that on the main lines of material development West Virginia is far in ahead of the Old Dominion of 50 years ago.

	West Virginia, 1860	West Virginia, 1913
Bound area, sq. mi.	64,284	24,922

West Virginia has a population averaging 55.5 to the square mile, which is more than twice the density of Virginia's population in 1860. Compared with the earlier Virginia, West Virginia has more than six times the amount of capital investment in manufacturing, and the value of the manufactured products is more than three times as great. It has a greater proportionate area of improved farm lands and a greater proportionate value of farm lands and improvements; it has more than twice as many miles of railroad lines, and the value of its mineral production, suggested by the amount of coal mined annually, is far greater. The total banking capital of all banks in Virginia in 1860 was $16-

995,156, and the amount of bank deposits was $7,729,652. In 1913 the capital invested in West Virginia in National banks alone is $7,600,000, and the amount of individual deposits in National banks is $51,815,630, and in financial institutions of all kinds $113,887,265.

Since 1860 the population of West Virginia has more than doubled, increasing from 618,457 to 1,335,900; its manufacturing capital has increased from $12,862,000 to $175,000,000, and the value of its manufactured products from $22,867,000 to $195,000,000; the value of its farm products from $19,360,000 to $95,828,000; the value of its forest products from $4,052,000 to $29,579,000, and the value of its mineral products from $2,455,000 to $104,000,000.

More and more the agricultural potentialities of the State are being appreciated and realized, its three well-defined divisions offering opportunities for the growing of grains, grasses, fruit, truck and tobacco, cattle raising and dairying. But the most marked development to date has been in the mineral districts, though in some respects only a beginning has been made there. More than half of the State is underlain with coal beds, which contained originally 150,000,000,000 tons of coal, of which less than 1 per cent has been mined. The State's coal area of 17,000 square miles is 5000 square miles greater than the coal area of Great Britain. At the rate at which coal was mined in the State last year, 65,700,000 tons, which was about 50 per cent more than the total bituminous coal output of the whole country in 1880 West Virginia's coal supply would last 2500 years. It ranks second in coal production among the States and first in the production of natural gas. Its output in 1911 having been 267,112,576 cubic ft. much of which is piped to other States for use for lighting, power and fuel, although a number of cities in the State, such as Wheeling, Wellsburg, Stetersville, Morgantown, Fairmont, Clarksburg, Grafton, Parkersburg, Huntington and Charleston, are also using it for lighting and for power and in the development of such industries as pottery, glass making, lampblack, etc. The Appalachian streams of the State have capacity for vast hydro-electric development, and many millions of dollars have already been invested directly in such development and in the upbuilding of diversified manufacturing industries as the State advances farther from the stage in which great attention is given to primary utilization of mineral, timber and agricultural resources. The celebration set for June 20 is bound to emphasize the facts which have been briefly sketched, and it should give a marked impetus to the growth of West Virginia on all lines.
