not because you have a fine house to live in, a handsome hat to wear, an elegant dress to appear in, a splendid equipage. And you are happy, if so, not because your house is plain, your attire mean and you must overcome go afoot. Not in these externals does happiness consist.

The Other World. There is a dignity in going away alone which we call dying—that wrapping of the mantle of immortality about us; that putting aside with a pale hand the azure curtains that are drawn around this cradle of a world; that venturing away from home for the first time in our lives for we are dead, and seeing foreign countries not laid down on any maps we have read about.

Making Home Happy. The husband has something to do to make his home a happy one, as well as the wife. When she tries so hard to please the one she loves best of all in the wide world—the one she clings to, though she must leave father, mother, brothers and sisters and many loving friends for his sake, and perhaps endure hardships never before thought of—what harm will it do him if he sometimes gives her proper meed of praise? A married woman loves the attention of her husband just as well as the young lady does her lover; and if she is a true wife she certainly is just as deserving of it.

There are some old men and women whose souls have ripened and sweetened, even under the chilling winds of adversity. Those whom they loved have been taken from them; that which they most ardently desired has been denied them; that which they would not have chosen has been laid upon them, and out of it all they have extracted sweetness, patience and strength. These qualities draw to them the weak and the sorrowful, whom they send away with something of that refreshment which the ailing must have felt who followed Christ when he laid his hand upon them.
