Poetical.

The Soldier's Morning Lay.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

Arouse, ye drowsy sleepers,

Up from your couch of clay!

The horse's lively capers

Now greet the new born day.

Our weapons are reflecting

Aurora's purple rays,

While all are yet a dreaming

Of victorious affrays.

Great God, our Lord and Father,

Look from Thy throne divine,

Your calls has brought us hither,

The war, O Lord, is Thine.

Thy grace is but required,

Then shall Freedom's banner wave,

And lead us thus inspired,

To glory or the grave.

A morn is fast approaching,

A morning long foretold,

For which the good are waiting,

And Angels now behold.

Its rays are fast appearing,

To cheer the good and free;

O may it soon be dawning—

The morn of Liberty.

Then shall our tow'ring bells

In merry peals resound;

From all the hills and dells,

Our grateful hearts respond.

When our course pervades

We'll share that happy sight!

For we, ye knightly blades,

We also shared the fight.

Parting.

When fond affliction's spell hath cast

Its web around the heart.

How truly sad it is at last

To be obliged to part.

How sad to catch the smother'd sigh,

To see the starting tear,

That dims the tender loving eye

Of those we hold most dear.

What, when the heart in friendship knits,

Can be more keenly felt

Than some rude stroke of Fate which splits

The link, Time ne'er can melt?

Alas! of every earthly we

Felt by the human heart,

Methods it is the greatest blow

From those we love to part.

Miscellaneous.

A Young Wife's Sorrow.

Containing an Important Lesson to Young Ladies.

'I don't like the tone of Martha's letter,' said Mrs. Barton to her husband one day. Martha was a daughter who had been married for three or four months and was then living several hundred miles away from the town in which her parents resided.

'Nor do I,' was the answer. 'If Edward is in anything unkind to her, I have been deceived in him.'

'There are peculiarities of character and temperament in every one that only a close intimacy can make apparent, and Martha has these as Edward. It is not improbable that something unseen before has revealed itself since the marriage, and stands as a source of irritation between them.'

Mr. Barton sighed. He was very fond of Martha. The lad had been a pet with him since childhood and this separation, in consequence of her marriage was a great trial. She thought of her being unhappy, pained him.

'Suppose,' said he, 'that we send for her to come home and make us a visit. It is nearly four months since she went away.'

'I was going to suggest something different.'

'What?'

'A visit to Martha.'

'That will be out of the question at least for me,' said Mr. Barton.

'I did not,' replied Mrs. Barton smiling, 'expect to include you in the visit.'

'Oh then you propose to take all the pleasure to yourself. Now, it strikes me as a better arrangement to have Martha pay us a visit. It will do her a great deal more good than merely to receive a visit from you. She will get back for a little while into her old home and see father and mother both, and then I will come in for a share of the enjoyment which is to be considered.'

'I've thought of that,' replied Mrs. Barton, 'and yet favor this visit to Martha. The reason is this: if I go there and stay a week or two I shall have an opportunity to see how she and Edward are getting along together. We must live with people, you know, to find out all about them. There may be some little impediments to happiness lying right in their path, which I may help them to pick up and cast aside; some little want of adaptation in the machinery of their lives, which prevents a movement in harmony that I may show them how to adjust.'

'I guess you're right, taking that view of the case,' said Mr. Barton.

The visit of Mrs. Barton was made accordingly. After the first brief session of gladness that followed a meeting with her mother had passed, Martha's countenance showed some lines not written there by sweet content. The mother asked no questions however, in the beginning, calculated to bring Martha out. She wanted a little time for observation. The young husband was bright cheerful, attentive and fond, and as he had been to her before the wedding day. But on the second morning after her arrival, she noticed that he did not talk as freely as usual at the breakfast table, and had something very much like a cloud over the sunshine of his countenance. Martha's manner was a little sober. Once or twice during the meal, Edward exhibited a feeling of annoyance at things not rightly ordered.

Mrs. Barton was already beginning to see the little impediments and obstructions to which she had referred in talking to her husband. But she did not encourage Martha to speak on the subject. She wanted to see more and understand the case better. On the third day, the cause of trouble between Edward and Martha—for a discordant string was really jarred in the harmony of their lives—became more clearly apparent to the mother. The little restraint which had been assumed at the beginning of her visit by both of the young people, was gradually laid aside and she saw them in the real life they were living.

The basis of the difficulty lay in the total unfitness of Martha for the position she had assumed that of housekeeper. I mean. And, in consequence, her young husband, in whose ideal of a home perfect order had been included everything so different from his anticipations, that a graceful acquiescence was impossible.

'I don't know what has come over Edward,' said Martha to her mother on the morning of the fourth day; after her husband had left for his place of business. Her eyes were swimming in tears for Edward had spoken last night and with ill-nature at the breakfast table. 'He used to be so kind, so gentle, so considerate of my comfort and feelings. But he seems to be impatient and harsh in his manner every day.'

'Has the reason of this never occurred to you?' Mrs. Barton's manner was grave. 'He is disappointed in something evidently. He does not find in you all that he expected.'

'Mother!' The young wife had a stared look.

'It must be so, Martha, else why should he be different from what he was. He has had an ideal of a wife, and you have failed to reach that ideal.'

The face of Martha, which had flushed became almost pale.

'And I am free to own,' continued the mother, 'that you fall considerably below my ideal.' I do not wonder at Edward's disappointment.

Tears began to fall over the young wife's cheeks. 'I'm sure,' said she sobbing, 'that I have been to him all that I know how to be. If love would draw upon me favor and kindness he would never look upon me as he does. Sometimes with cold eyes and a clouded face nor speak in angry impatient words that have hurt me worse than blows.'

'But you have not done for him, all that you now do to do,' said Mrs. Barton.

'I fail to comprehend you, mother,' was replied to this.

'You do not make his home as pleasant as it should be. There seems to be no anticipation of his wants and no provision against discomfort. Everything is left to your two servants who do pretty much as they please.'

Why, mother.

'It is true, my daughter. I have looked on with closely observant eyes since I have been here and I must say that I am disappointed in you' in every case that Edward has shown impatience in my presence, the source of annoyance lay in your neglect of a plain household duty. It was so this morning so yesterday.'

'He was annoyed at the burned steak this morning,' said Martha, in answer. 'That was not my fault. I'm not the cook.'

'It is your place to have a competent cook,' said Mrs. Barton.

'If I can find one, mother.'

'The one you have now is not to be trusted to prepare a meal.'

'I know that, but how can I help myself?'

'And knowing that, you never went near the kitchen to see that she did not spoil the steak intended for your husband's breakfast. It might have taken you ten or fifteen minutes to superintend personally, the preparation of this morning's meal and so made it worthy of being set before your husband; but instead of this, you sat reading, or talking, from the time you were dressed until the bell rang. When we went down there was no butter on the table, no knife and fork to the dish of meat; no salt nor any napkin to your husband's plate. The table cloth was soiled, and you scolded the waiters for not putting on a clean one.—The meal opened in disorder, which you might have prevented by a little forethought, and progressed and ended in annoyance and had feeling.—Now, who was to blame for all this?'

'But, mother, you don't expect me to go into the kitchen and cook?' said Martha.

'The captain who undertakes to sail a ship must know all about navigation. Is it more unreasonable to expect that a woman who takes upon herself the obligations of a wife, should know how to conduct a household? Is a woman less responsible in her position than a man? If so, what moral laws gave the distinction?' I have not seen them: The captain does not trust the ship wholly to the man at the helm. He takes observations, examines chart, and sees and knows for himself that every thing is done at the right time and in the right place. His thought and his will are active and predominant in every part of the ship, for on him rests all the responsibility. And it is so everywhere in man's work. You ask if I expect you to go into the kitchen and cook?'

I answer yes, in case there is no one else to prepare your husband's food. If you
