

THE PILOT, EDITED BY DUFF GREEN. Published at No. 11, Water St., Baltimore, nearly opposite Chesapeake.

TERMS.—Daily, at Six Dollars per annum, or Twelve and a half Cents per week, payable to the carriers.

From the New York Express. At a Cabin on the North Bend, Ohio, April 3, 1840.

To the Downingville folks at home and elsewhere. Fellow Citizens—The Ohio has ruz, and so has the hull western reserve—on by hard rain and other by hard cider.

The office holders and other government folks out here are making great calculations on Eastern Elections; they say that old Connecticut will go all hollow for "Sub-Treasury and no Credit."

There is no place like The Cabin here, to know what is going on—East, West, North, and South; for pretty much all creation, coming and going, stop to see the General—to say nothing of the special committees sent from all quarters, and about two bushels of letters every day; and the way the General gets along with matters, convince me more and more that he is one of them kind of folks we read about, who, arter doing good service, are pushed aside by the crowd a spell, who git their eye on a new light, or jack-o'-lantern, which leads them into the muck, and then they git back again if they can; and place the old and neglected Veteran at the head.

There was a chap come along through these parts tother day from Washington, on his way west, with an appointment by government as "a receiver of Public Land Money,"—and of course come along electioneering.

on 'em would git an office, and that would give 'em hard money at any rate. Yesterday, this same critter called on the General just as the horn was blow'd for dinner, and the workmen all come in from the diggings, and the General of course invited all strangers to take a seat with him and his people at the table; and arter the General had ask'd a blessing and we all got to work at the dishes, this "land receiver" or "sub-treasurer," got talking with the General about the advantages of the "sub-treasury" system; and as he sot next to the General and I on tother side, he thought it want necessary to talk loud, and so says he, in a low tone, almost a whisper, "why General, this sub-treasury system will be the making of any man like you who employs laborers."

"How so?" says the General. "Why," says he, "you know it will nock down the prices of labor, as Mr. Walker and Mr. Buchanan says, to less than half price what is now paid, and the difference then, you know, goes right into the pockets of the employer!"

We are looking out here now to know how the Connecticut election has gone; and though we don't care much about it, yet as there are a good many folks from their parts here and about in the great western reserve,—they feel a kind of pride about it,—and "every little helps in the first go off," as the good old woman said when she emptied her wash-tub in the big Erie canal, the day the great Clinton first floated in a canal boat thro' that "wild, costly and destructive State speculation."

Yours, with great respect. J. DOWNING.

From the N. Y. Morning Dispatch. EX-SHERIFF PARKINS.

A troubled spirit is at rest. Joseph W. Parkins, Ex-Sheriff of London, departed this life suddenly, at Newark, on Sunday morning. He had been ill for some weeks, but was considered as in the way of convalescence, when his sudden decease put an end to the delusive hopes which none more strongly than himself entertained of his entire recovery.

There was very much to admire in the conduct and character of this singular and original genius, and as much to disgust; but his very foibles, where a person did not happen to be the victim of them, were an interesting study. He was one of the most contumacious and pugnacious mortals that ever breathed the breath of life.

Ex-Sheriff Parkins came to this country about ten years since, an English Radical, almost, or at any rate strongly prepossessed in favor of the very largest liberty. He travelled over some portions of the country, delighted with its enterprise, and caught with the rapidly increasing value of property.

These creditors, or a portion of them, filled a creditor's bill in Chancery, and an order from the Chancellor was issued, directing Mr. Parkins to surrender certain bonds, known to be in his possession, for the liquidation of the verdicts. Parkins summarily issued a verbal order to the Chancellor, to take himself to a place where Spohn's oal stoves are not needed.

After the order came for his release, he still made the prison a lodging for some time. He was an honest, but wrong-headed and strong-headed old man, with prominent faults, and virtues as prominent. He knew no such doctrine as expediency, and no such feeling as fear.—He had an iron frame, and his leading trait was an indomitable perseverance, to the last.—He unquestionably sinned, but was much more sinned against than sinning; and if an impartial history of his life in this country could be written, certain men, tolerably high in standing, would occupy no enviable place in it.

was indeed with him "a fitful fever." Required in pace. This eccentric individual was, we understand, a natural son of the Duke of Norfolk.
