THE SPIRITS AT HOME.

It being announced that Dr. Baldwin would interview the spirits at Minerva Hall, our reporter repaired to that spot on Thursday night and witnessed the first act of the Glendower of the evening.

And these specters have always been as credulous as any conjuror could wish. De Foote sold a monthly edition of a book for some publisher by this device. He narrated—with that power of simulation for which he was so remarkable—the wonderful coincidences of a vision with an undoubted fact.

THE SEANCE. This ceremony, so called from the fact that it consists chiefly of tying persons fast in chairs, was introduced by a few remarks from Professor Baldwin, who seemed to treat it experimentally, not being exactly satisfied whether the spirits would be entirely obedient to his orders.

On the platform was an armchair of stained pine. It was without shelves. It was deep enough to take in two chairs—and we had nearly said the audience—and wide enough for a third chair to accommodate the spirit visitor, who was supposed to have come a long way and to need rest.

In order to insure perfect fairness in the subsequent exhibition, three respectable and responsible gentlemen were nominated from the audience, and having been put to the vote by the professor, were without opposition elected a committee of inspection.

Mr. Cassidy carried with him an impressive case, and his bearing satisfied us that if there were a humbug in disguise anywhere within several squares around Mr. Cassidy and his case would detect it.

Indeed, it was almost like taking phrenology in reverse. But the knot was tied, and as the experienced tyer left the stand he remarked that he had tied it the best he knew.

And so obviously thought that excellent sailmaker himself. But this was not sufficient to convince an incredulous generation. The professor produced a lot of handkerchiefs. He told us what he knew about handkerchiefs. He explained that a man might draw his hand through an old-fashioned pair of clinkers, but that the patent brooch fitted itself so exactly to the wrist of the wearer that you could not, as he said, "get a pin between them." Mr. Cassidy, having his case under his arm, and determined to let no opportunity be practiced on the too susceptible audience which he had in charge, examined these handkerchiefs with close scrutiny. In the course of his experiments he inadvertently closed one upon his own wrist, and it required the conjoint ingenuity of the professor and himself to prevent his wearing the ornament home to a horror-stricken family.

Among the many charitable institutions that are an honor to our city, and that succor and shelter our poor and destitute people, is the Toure Infirmary. This institution is situated on Peters, between Callopie and Galene streets. The monotonous appearance of the environs is broken by this massive building rising up to the view.

This institution is principally intended for the sick Israelites, who are taken in and cared for until they have recuperated their strength; yet, in cases of need, the sick of all religions are provided for. There is also a day department attached to the institution.

Many efforts have recently been made to induce owners of yachts to make a regatta, especially as several new vessels have been floated in our waters this summer. The contest will be made at Bay St. Louis on Monday, the eleventh instant, with prizes for first, second, third and fourth class boats.

That our distinguished fellow-citizen has passed safely over the rough and rugged road from our city to St. Louis is evidenced by the following paragraph which we find in the Advertiser of the twenty-fourth.

We learn that Mr. Bidwell has made engagements with some of the most attractive stars and combinations in this country, and the coming season at the Academy promises to be a most brilliant one.
