THE VAGABONDS. BY J. T. BROWNING.

We are two travelers, Roger and I. I am a dog—come here, you scamp! Jump for the gentleman—mind your eye!

There is another creature living. Would you and I were through every disaster. No food, no shelter, no clothing.

Why not reform? That's exactly said. But I've gone through such wretched treatment. Sometimes forgetting what I mean to do.

Another glass, and strong, to deaden. I wonder how he such a lumpy, lumpy, lumpy. Aching in his place of a heart!

There was a great excitement in our little household when Robert came home one evening and announced that his wife was coming to visit us.

Max was quite alone in the world, our aunt and her husband both dying when he was quite young.

Max resignedly glanced as he uttered these words, and sat leaning back and gazing at the curtain.

that the child smile had passed away from our dear friend's face. Did I not see that that shining in her dark eyes might be the light of a woman's love?

The picture was finished on my birthday, and Max, who was my friend, was all taken in to see it, and never since have I been so beautiful a picture.

That evening we were all sitting in the moonlight. Max was smoking by the window, and Birdie in her usual place on a stool at his side.

Max, you are a German, and should know the difference between a German and a Jew. His face was clearly defined by the light streaming through the open window.

hands were cold and she was shaking from the cold. "My poor little pet, what is it?" I asked anxiously.

My poor little pet, what is it? I asked anxiously. Never shall I forget the pitiful eyes she turned on me.
