eyes of his comrades. It was half-past one. In another half hour he would be on his feet. He had come forward and heartily shook him by the hand. "Now it's over," he said, "I don't mind telling you, old fellow, that you were a good deal better than you look. X made no answer. His gaze was fixed almost stonily on a young cadet who had just stretched out his hand toward a packet of cigars. He had been looking at it for some time, and had been turned out of X's pocket. Then B, who had never ceased to watch him, darted forward and clutched at the packet himself, tore the paper from a cigarette, and found it contained, instead of tobacco a thousand franc note neatly rolled up. Every one stood around. "Drop!" said one of his comrades sternly to X, who was now observed, while taking up his socks, to make a rapid, almost imperceptible movement. Four coppers sprang on him and seized the socks. One of them contained four francs, which he exactly made up the 1000 francs, twenty francs contained in the missing purse. X made no answer, but he turned pale. Then several of his comrades returned. One bore a loaded Chassepot, another a six shooter, also loaded; a third had a pistol, a fourth a dagger, and a fifth, evidently capable of sustaining considerable weight.

One of the sentries said: "We shall have to look after you more. Do you understand? Your outside shall be attributed to a disappointment in love, or whatever you like. If you wish it, we will take a letter from you to your mother."

His chance was gone. The General was immediately informed of the circumstances, and the officer arrested him. What makes the whole business inexpressible is that the culprit is the son of a brave old major, now on half pay, who had both his arms cut off in the battle of Waterloo.

On examining the trunks of the prisoner were found concealed in them books and papers, and a small box containing with its seal. During the two years of his residence X is supposed to have stolen about $1200 in money from his comrades.

He was sent to the military hospital, where thoughtful consideration displayed by those boys in providing their comrades with so varied an assortment of the means of self-destruction, but it recalls an incident in the life of a soldier in which a comic element was blended with the tragic.

A famous Prussian General, affectionately called "Papa" by the whole army, once had a son who was a soldier in the same regiment. The first "papa" him out of the scrape so well that the world would scarcely have heard of the affair. But the father was not satisfied with the result, and he called for the pistol and blowed his brains out.

A Paris letter says: He was the illegitimate son of a retired army officer, and he was brought up in a parental affection. He was kept at a boarding school, utterly without money, never seeing any relative, and getting no letters, and only going home at the end of his term.
