Holland.
Holland, known as North and South Holland, forms part of the northern part of the Netherlands. These provinces are composed of land rescued from the sea and defended by immense dikes. Holland was inhabited by the Batavi in the time of Caesar, who made a league with them. It became part of the kingdom of Austria. From the tenth to the fifteenth century it was governed by counts under the German emperors. Holland was at one time a Dutch republic. It was created a kingdom in 1806, and Louis Bonaparte, father of Napoleon III., was declared king—Exchange.

A Halloween Scheme
It Was Well Planned and Worked Well
By F. A. MITCHEL

"I wish," said Mrs. Edgerton to her friend, Mrs. Tisdale, "that your Alice would fall in love with my Frank. A young bachelor is so beset by temptations. If Frank were married I should not have to keep worrying about him all the time. He is out every evening, sometimes till morning. I don't know where he goes or what he is doing. I never go to sleep till he comes in, and thus I spend hours worrying."

"You have no need to worry about your boy," said the other. "Frank is simply doing what most young men of fortune do at his age—he is enjoying the novelty of things. When that novelty wears off he will become engrossed in more serious matters."

"Would you object to a match between him and Alice?"

"On the contrary, I should welcome it. We have little or nothing to leave Alice, and I should be glad to see her married to a man whose income would preclude the probability of her coming to want."

"Suppose," rejoined Mrs. Edgerton thoughtfully, "we lay a trap to bring them together. It would be useless for me to say to Frank that I wished him to marry Alice, and even if he acceded to my desire it would be equally useless for you to try to force Alice to accept him. If we could contrive to throw them together I would have great hopes of Frank falling in love with her, she is so attractive in every way. But I have my doubts about Alice. It seems to me that she is too serious, too thoughtful, too good for a man of the world like Frank."

"My daughter is very impressionable. There is also a good deal of romance in her nature. If we could bring about some episode by which Frank would appear to be a hero in her eyes we would win our point, or if it could be made to appear that fate intends him for her husband that would have the same effect."

"I have it!" exclaimed the other, speaking suddenly a thought that flashed upon her. "Halloween will be here in another week. I will give a Halloween party. I will invite Alice, and you must come too. We will concoct some scheme to make it appear that fate intends her and Frank for each other."

Mrs. Tisdale made no objection to this, though she would have preferred that the scheme be worked out at her own home, since it would be more becoming that the man should come to the woman rather than the woman to the man. But Mrs. Edgerton possessed a country place especially suitable to a house party. It had been closed for the season, but could be reopened.

Mrs. Edgerton and Mrs. Tisdale were especially adapted to carry out such a scheme as they had in mind. Both had been married very young and had jumped almost from girlhood into a gay world. Neither had yet passed out of the forties, nor had either lost her adaptation for playing a part.

"Mamma," said Alice Tisdale, looking at her mother through a pair of eyes to remind one of a deep pool darkened by surrounding rocks and overhanging verdure, "do you really think there is anything in Halloween?"

"Why do you ask, Alice?"

"Well, we are going to Mrs. Edgerton's country place for a Halloween party, and I would like to know before we go whether the belief or fancy or whatever it is that one may see a future husband or wife is all rubbish or whether there is anything in it."

"We don't know, dear, where superstitions end and a legitimate faith begins. There are certainly many wonderful things in the world that we call supernatural. Some of them may be referable to natural laws of which we have no knowledge."

Mrs. Tisdale was well satisfied with herself at this method of answering her daughter's question. She would not intentionally deceive her child, and she felt that in her reply she had spoken nothing that was not true. What she said made a marked impression on Alice. She went to the library and, taking down a book on strange customs, turned to Halloween and read of girls seeing the faces of their future husbands in looking glasses, the setting afloat of candles on a river and other such methods of determining their future. If she did not believe in their efficacy she certainly did not disbelieve.

The house party at Mrs. Edgerton's country place assembled in the afternoon preceding Halloween. They dined and after dinner sat before the great fireplace in the hall telling ghost stories. At 10 o'clock the hostess announced to them that they were expected to scatter themselves over the large domain. There was room enough for all, she told them, and if it was fated that they should meet with any adventure to show them their future mates there was no reason why it should not be done on this Halloween.

The girls all obeyed the hostess, but some of the young men preferred a game of bridge or billiards and demurred to going out into a cool night under the stars to participate in what they considered a childish performance. But Mrs. Edgerton told them that they had not been invited to a bridge or a billiard party, but to a Halloween party, and they must accept the situation. With this they sallied forth, some to sit in a summer house and smoke, while others, respecting their hostess' wishes, wandered over the place. Lights were seen on the bosom of the river, indicating that some of the girls had brought candles and set them afloat.

Frank Edgerton had been requested by his mother to set an example to the other men guests by entering into the spirit of the affair and go forth in search of adventure. He strolled alone on the river bank watching the lighted candles and lighted a cigar, resolving to smoke it to the end before returning to the house, for he was bent on pleasing his mother and feared that he would return too soon. The night was not cold, the stars were bright, and Frank was content to remain in the open so long as the case required.

Suddenly from bushes, perhaps a hundred yards from him, a light flashed. It was not the season for fireflies, and even if it had been no fireflies could give so great a light. It at once occurred to Frank that it had been set by a human being. Either some of the men or girl guests were seeking an adventure. If a girl Frank was ready to accommodate her. He walked toward the place where he had seen the light, but when he reached it found nothing but bushes. While looking about him the light flashed again, but from a different location. Frank went to the new spot with the same result as before.

It was evident that some one, probably a girl, was bent on leading him a game of hide and seek. He was quite ready to play it and waited for another flash. It came, and this time, instead of walking leisurely toward it, he ran. Nevertheless the result was the same as before. He found no one. For some time the light flashed from different points, and yet the trend was in one direction. Though Frank made violent dashes for it, when he reached the point where he had seen it he found only silence and a low growth of evergreens. Once, instead of seeing a flash, he heard a low laugh. This settled the point as to the sex of the hider, for it was a woman's laugh. Frank ran toward the place from which it seemed to come, but one has no sense by which to judge of the direction of sound, and when he reached the illuminated place the light was flashed in an entirely different one.

Finally Frank followed a flash, and though he found darkness he touched something human. Resolving that whoever had been leading him should not escape him, he threw his arms about it and held it fast. That it was feminine was evident from the apparel.

"Let me go," said a girl, struggling.

"Not until I have learned who you are. You have been leading me a fine dance, and I must at least get a glimpse of your face before I will release you. Come, flash your light!"

"I have no light. It is you who have been leading me, Mr. Edgerton. Though I can't see your face, I recognize your voice."

"Do you mean to tell me that you have not a flashlight?"

"I have not."

"This is very strange. You are Miss Tisdale, are you not?"

"I am."

No one knows whether Frank Edgerton during this dialogue continued to hold Alice Tisdale in his arms or released her. Alice at once became impressed with a fancy that on this Halloween a will-o'-the-wisp had conducted her to her future husband, and, though she was a modest girl, it is quite possible that she did not continue her efforts to free herself.

Later the two walked into the house together. Most of the guests had returned. Some were telling stories they had invented of marvelous happenings, some admitting disappointments. Alice Tisdale said nothing. Perhaps she was waiting for Frank Edgerton to tell her experience. But Frank held his peace. He was puzzled. He believed that Alice told the truth when she denied having a flashlight. Alice was wondering if she had met a real Halloween experience.

Mrs. Edgerton and Mrs. Tisdale when their children entered were sitting together chatting apparently on commonplace topics, for they showed no animation. The others were interested in one another's stories of their experiences. Edgerton turned to Alice and looked at her inquiringly, as much as to say, "Is it possible that so retiring a girl could have led me such a dance?" She dropped her eyes under his gaze. He wished he was back in the dark place where he had seized her and was again holding her in his arms.

"Come out on the porch with me," he said, "and let us have a look at the stars."

Whether they looked at the stars or not nobody but themselves knows, but certain it is that within a month they were engaged.

What Mrs. Edgerton and Mrs. Tisdale were saying to each other so quietly when the son of the one and the daughter of the other entered the house was this:

"Did your flashlight work well?" asked Mrs. Edgerton.

"Splendidly. But Frank almost caught me several times."

"You had the hardest part. I had no trouble with Alice at all. I led her along like a lamb to the slaughter. After flashing my light I had plenty of time to get out of the way. The electric lamps are blinding, and I don't think she dared go very fast in the dark."

"It's lucky we had our course well laid out. As it was, I found it difficult to draw Frank to the point designated."

"I wonder if we have succeeded."

"That remains to be seen."

A PANAMA DELUGE
On the Isthmus They Know What a Real Rainstorm Means.
LIKE SOLID WALLS OF WATER

It Comes Down in Torrents So Dense That the Rest of the World Seems to Be Blotted Out—One Three Hour Downpour That Established a Record.

Before us spread the reposing, powerful, sun shimmering Pacific. Across the bay, clear as an etching, lay Panama, backed by Ancon hill. In regular cadence the waves swept in on the sands. Such was the scene described by Mr. Harry A. Franck in "Zone Policeman 88" when he and three comrades went one day for a swim in the ocean.

We dived in, keeping an eye out for the sharks, although we knew they never came so far in and probably would not bite if they did. The sun blazed down white hot from a cloudless sky. The Lieutenant and Sergeant Jack had not been able to come, but we arranged the races and jumps in the sand, for all that, and after our swim went into them with a will and—

A raindrop fell, then a few more, then many more. Before we had finished the hundred yard dash it was undeniably raining. Half a minute later "bucketfuls" would have been a weak simile. The blanket of water blotted out Panama and Ancon hill across the bay, blotted out the distant bathers, then even those close at hand.

We remained under water for a time—to keep dry. But the rain whipped our faces as with thousands of stinging lashes. We crawled out and dashed blindly up the bank toward the sawmill, the rain beating on our all but bare skins. It felt as if might feel to stand in Miraflores locks and let the sand pour down upon us from sixty feet above. When at last we stumbled under cover and up the stairs to where our clothing hung it was as if a weight of many tons had been lifted from our shoulders.

The sawmill was without side walls and consisted only of a sheet iron roof and floors. The storm pounded on the roof with a roar that made the sign language necessary. It was as if we were surrounded on all sides by solid walls of water and forever shut off from the outer world—if, indeed, that had survived.

Sheets of water slashed in farther and farther across the floor. We took to huddling behind beams and under saw benches—the militant storm hunted us out and wetted us bit by bit. "The admiral" and I climbed up and tucked ourselves away on the forty-five degree I beams up under the roaring roof. The angry water gathered together in columns and swept in and up to soak us.

At the end of an hour the downpour had increased some hundred per cent. That was the day when little harmless streams tore themselves apart into great gorges and left their pathetic little bridges alone and deserted out in the middle of the gulf. That was the famous May 12, 1912, when Ancon recorded the greatest rainfall in her history—7.23 inches, virtually all within three hours.

Three of us were ready to surrender and swim home through it. But there was "the admiral" to consider. He was dressed clear to his scarfpin, and Panama tailors fear horrible holes in a policeman's salary. So we waited and dodged and squirmed into smaller holes for another hour and grew steadily wetter.

At length dusk began to fall, but instead of dying with the day the fury of the storm increased. It was then that "the admiral" capitulated, seeing fate plainly in league with his tailor. Wigwagging his decision to us, he led the way down the stairs and dived into the world awash.

Wet? We had not taken the third step before we were streaming like fire hose. There was nearly an hour of it, splashing knee deep through what had been little, dry, sandy hollows; steering by guess, for the eye could make out nothing fifty yards ahead, even before the cheese thick darkness fell; bowed like nonagenarians under the burden of water, staggering back and forth as the storm caught us crosswise or the earth gave way under us. "The admiral's" patent leather shoes—but why go into painful details?

The wall of water was as thick as ever when we fought our bowed and weary way up over the railway bridge. When we had gathered force for the last dash we plunged toward our several goals. As the door of 111 slammed behind me the downpour suddenly slackened. As I paused before my room to drain it stopped raining.

Dancing.
Dancing was originally a mode of expressing religious feeling, for instance, David's dancing before the Ark, and was often used in military displays, though the Romans, like orientals, usually had their dancing done for them by hired slaves.—London Answers.
