A Seafaring Man's Adventure With a Craft Which He Did Not Exactly Understand.

Hartford Courant. In 1850 a whaling mate from Nantucket was fitting out for the mines near our back door in Sacramento, Cal. He was a tall, serious, large featured man, probably the head of a family at home. He was particular in his outfit, and was a long time getting ready. After about a fortnight he came down street with a big mule in tow that sold cheaper, he said, because there was no sufficient mate for him in the country. There was considerable sloping deck room on him and great capacity for pack saddles and the hanging on of camp and mining furniture. The Nantucket mate had a tent, a gold-washer, two picks, two shovels, a frying pan, a box of salt meat, do bread, do clothes, a set of long fire arms, and a little demijohn of choice liquor that I remember, and I don't if I recollect half he had, for he was a great provider. The mule was a good looking one. He stood grave and still as a church, among the chips near the wood pile at our back door while the mate, an expert rigger, with plenty of voluntary help, was packing. I was just then laying the soap-heel of a dinner and cleaning up the kitchen after breakfast.

There was one pack-saddle and one riding-saddle on the mule, strung along amidships, I remember. Not much mule was to be seen between ears, tail and hoofs when the mate had knotted the last tie of his hampers, belayed the spar line, ship-shape, and swung his leg like a derrick from our big chopping block over the animal all ready to make sail. He had a pair of weighing scales in his hands, and some declared afterward that the mate would have got safely under way if he had not grazed the mule's belly with the flukes of one of those anchors. But this will never, probably, be known. In one instant the mass of hard wood ware, with the bags, was in fearful commotion, and shot up into the air. I thought the whole concern would tumble down through the canvas roof of our kitchen and spill the dinner of forty people. But I guess the mule had canvassed the whole business over. As the dust settled and our wits gathered from amazement and alight, the mule, clean as he was born, was seen calmly cropping weeds that grew where we flung slops; the mate, with surprise and bruises struggling for mastery on his face, was gathering himself out of the woodpile. A spare block parted from his fellow, first fixed his wondering gaze, and a small from the wrecked demijohn helped restore his senses to his quarter of an acre of scattered property. He said simply: "I guess I'll sell that mule," and we heard afterward that he chartered an ox team for his freight.

The reader must understand that a backing mule or horse is a perfectly safe animal in his back that is not reckoned in ordinary equine osteology. I have thought since that this mule's back hinge must have come from the examination of this particular mining expedition it was discovered that the girths of the saddle found upon the ground were neither slick, unbacked, nor untried, but simply shed or slacked off. On scores of observers no one could have been so done, the movement was so rapid and such a dust was flying. The mule was for a minute the invisible center of a storm cloud, from which radiated, as from an explosion, the fifty or sixty articles I have enumerated.

How Things Appear to the Insane. One who has been insane, in Popular Science Monthly. The first that remember of my attack was while I was riding in a railroad car. It seemed to me that the passengers in the forward part were getting up amateur theatricals. The fact that this did not surprise me, nor appear at all out of place, illustrates one curious feature of insanity, and that is its close similarity in many respects to dreaming. It is well known that the strange phantasmagoria attendant upon most of our dreams never strikes us at the time as at all astonishing, illogical or contradictory, because the critical faculty in sleep is partially and perhaps wholly dormant. And so also is it in insanity. And as a second illustration of this feature of insanity, I present to you the dream, so everything that occurs within the sight or hearing of an insane man affects him in like manner. Also, he has no more control over his words and actions, when the insanity is complete, than a somnambulist. And when a patient comes to himself, after having been insane, he feels as though he had been having a long and, sometimes, a very unpleasant dream.

Some of my delusions were of a frightful character, and resembled a nightmare more than anything else; but more often they were by no means disagreeable. Of course, it seemed strange to me afterwards that I could have been carried away by such absurdities. At one time I thought that the end of the world had come and the day of judgment was at hand. This was somewhat remarkable, because I had not for years been a believer in scriptural prophecies relating to those two events. I may say that I had the doctrine that there is a hell of fire, yet in imagination I visited that place of torment and witnessed the tortures of the damned—without, however, getting scorched myself. Some strange conceits that I had come across in books, occasionally suggested material for my mind to work on. I saw men whose souls I believed had been taken from their bodies, leaving behind the mere husks, possessing the form, but not the life, of a character described in Bulwer's "Strange Story." Again I thought that demons occasionally reanimated human bodies after death; and this fancy I must have got from a dramatic work by Bishop Cox entitled "Saul," in which the evil spirit seeks to trouble that unfortunate monarch, reanimated and took possession of the body of a priest whom Saul had slain. I mention these instances as serving to show the dream-like character of insanity.

Mount Hood's Crater. Mount Hood, in Washington Territory, was recently ascended by a large party. They reached an elevation of 12,500 feet, where they spent several hours. When above the snow line the men constructed a slight, and treated the women to a July sleigh ride. The crater was penetrated a distance of 100 feet. There was a ceaseless drip of water from the roof of the ice-encased entrance, caused by a warm air current coming from the slumbering fires far below, from whence a loud hissing noise arose. A rock hurled down produced a deafening reverberation.

Arkansas Linnings. Opie E. Read. In the eyes of do work look makes a smart man out of a fool. Dar's only a mighty short stop 'twixt selfishness and honesty. It is strong selfishness that makes a man steady. De man with a thimble mind is never alone kept when he's in company, and is never in company kept when he's alone. De man what don care ter be credited wid de work what he himself does, ain't keen ter gin credit ter oder people for what da do.

High School Girls' Quarrel. Oil City Derrick. "I heard Mr. Duddy speak of you yesterday in terms of puerile conceit," remarked the high school girl to her dearest friend. "And what did you say?" "I coincided with his laudations."

Well, I always thought you were a friend of mine, but if you allow people to speak about me like this without saying a word, I'll never speak to you again, you hateful thing, so there."
