BROAD ENOUGH FOR ALL.

That is What Annie Jenness-Miller Says About the Field for Dress Reform.

The Foremost Advocate is Now Resting From Her Labors in Beautiful Evanston.

Physical Education Quite as Important as Mental—A National Institution of Physical Culture Demanded.

Mrs. Annie Jenness-Miller, the fair advocate of dress reform whose agitation of the subject of artistic dress for the last half-dozen years has resulted in a universal interest among women, is quietly living in a picturesque cottage in Evanston at present, taking a needed rest from her labors and analyzing the movement among the women at Chautauque in favor of a further trenchment in the matter of feminine wearing apparel. To a reporter of the Chicago Evening Post she said: "I have taken no part in the present discussion of dress reform for two reasons, the first of which is because I am in need of the rest I am now taking, and the second because the field for dress reform is broad enough to permit every intelligent woman to evolve some idea which, in whole or in part, may in time be of practical value to the world at large. I am content to rest upon my oars, as it were. I have, thanks to the intelligence of American women, planted the seeds of this reform which is now approaching fruition. There are many gifted women enlisted in the cause at present, and they will, I am sure, carry on the good work with a conscientious regard for the offices I have performed, and treat the subject with the broad spirit of liberality it merits. To benefit womanhood is a duty of womanhood in general and not of individuals. My efforts in this respect are recognized by the women who have adopted the reforms I have advocated, and they are many.

"Dress reform will care for itself, and I am content to leave it in the hands of women who can add an idea to it. In the future I shall devote myself to a greater field for reform than existed when I first turned my attention to reforming women's dress. The care of the body and the thorough mental training of women embrace an opportunity for reform of greater import than that relating to dress, because the latter is contingent upon both physical fitness and intelligent treatment. I have long believed that the time must come when the necessity for the physical education of youth would be recognized as quite as important as the mental, and I have desired to hope more so. Sound bodily development can certainly be demonstrated to be of more importance to the immediate welfare of the individual than mental culture, especially if the latter be accompanied and limited by physical weakness and suffering; indeed, I am convinced that well-sustained mental strength and profound mental judgment and justice must rest upon the solid foundation of physical health; while the grace of bodily culture is certainly quite as pleasing as the attraction of mental culture.

"The remedy lies in scientific physical upbuilding, and the means for widespread physical upbuilding do not exist in this country at present, nor indeed in any other. It must be created, established and made to appeal to the practical common sense of the people for its support. A national institution of physical culture is a demand of our higher civilization. The time is ripe for it, and in my judgment the practical setting forth of the self-evident advantages is all that is needed to win generous and enthusiastic support to the cause which will make it possible to establish and maintain a model and thoroughly equipped institution for the education of teachers who will find employment in public schools all over the land to develop bodies coincident with brains by rational and scientific methods.

"For a long time I have believed in the necessity for such an institution, and my judgment has been strengthened by discussing the matter with able men and women whose opinions are decidedly in favor, and whose substantial contributions to such an end have in more than one case been promised.

"In my lectures next spring, when I shall again go on the platform, I shall outline a plan for such a work and set forth the advantages of training at an institution devoted exclusively to physical culture and the spread of scientific ideas of life and development. To erect and furnish a suitable building of classic and noble proportions, at the national capital, Washington, to carry this work forward in a manner worthy of a great nation like our own, a large fund is necessary. I shall devote my best energies for the next five years to the purpose of raising such a fund and establishing such an institution, and I ask the hearty co-operation of all who are interested in the development of a better social status, of a sounder moral tone and a generally higher and more comprehensive bodily education, which will include the harmonious development of all the material forces of the human body, and the mental and moral. The main part of my public lecture work will be in the interest of this object, and I believe that my efforts will be generously seconded by the press and the people of the country.

"This work will be in no sense the work of personal ambition, and it will know no limitations of personality, nor will it appeal to the interests of one class or another of the whole people. It will not be sectarian, connected with any 'ism' for the benefit of any section of the country, or any favored class of the people—it will be in the best sense an institution for the national physical education. Located at the capital, as a most convenient and appropriate center, and one favored by nature and art, it must partake of the general tone of its surroundings. The organization will be a stock company, and the control of funds and general management vested in a board of trustees whose names will be the guaranty for success and faithful management. Its faculty and its lecturers will be the ablest the world affords, and its aim universal physical, mental and moral upbuilding.

"The course of training will include not only a thorough knowledge of anatomy, with dissecting, physiology and practical experiments and the study of the chemistry of foods in their relation to blood and body building, heredity and other like subjects, but the best models of art, and lectures with artistic demonstrations for the cultivation of understanding and appreciation of symmetry and proportion, will form an important part of the course. The stock company organization upon a large and equitable basis will afford all learners certain equal opportunities for securing scholarship advantages. Any section, community, club, organization, school board or any may secure by the purchase of a limited amount of stock secure spots and send one student, pledged to teach for a time, for the entire course without further expense.

"I have received pledges of at least $50,000 already, and an amount of within a year or two all the money required will be forthcoming. I think that $500,000 could be used to advantage in constructing, equipping and maintaining such an institution."

Things Worth Remembering.

That it is dangerous to stand near a tall tree or spire during a thunder storm; that the southwest corner of the cellar is the "cyclone safety point"; that there is no medicine so universally applicable to sickness as fresh air and sunshine; that blowing out the gas, before retiring is funny—yet everybody except the man who tries it; that you may save by the purchase of a ticket, but it will not remove grease spots; that the Wisconsin Central is the most popular route to Milwaukee, Chicago, and points east and south. For tickets, etc., apply to any ticket agent.
