FOR AND ABOUT GIRLS.

Those Who Take to Bohemianism Like a Duck Takes to the Water.

The Old Maid Is Gone and the Girl Bachelor Has Come.

A Maiden Who Says She Knows How to Manage a Man by Aiming at His Mind.

Behold the old maid! Presto, change! Behold the girl bachelor!

There is a difference of opinion about the much-talked-of girl bachelor. Some say that she is a new species in the social fauna, while others contend that she is only a modified form of the familiar division of the social kingdom known as the old maid.

Popular prejudice, weary, perhaps, of the persistence with which it has heaped ignominy upon the title of old maid, has opened an avenue by which it can perform a dignified retreat to the standard of the girl bachelor.

In response to a murmur of hints that it now swears allegiance to those to whom it once gave only pity and endurance, popular prejudice asserts that a girl bachelor is as different from an old maid as a yachtman is from a galley slave.

However this may be, the girl bachelor is becoming a recognized factor of modern social life, and her tribe is increasing with a rapidity which would have satisfied the well-wisher of Abou Ben Adhem.

It is a significant fact, furthermore, that the rise of this new social class is simultaneous with a perceptible decline in the time honored institution of matrimony.

A great many erroneous people have attempted to account for this deplorable falling off among the devotees of Hyman, and there seems to be a popular idea that the young man is responsible for the present depressed condition of the matrimonial market.

His unwedded estate is ascribed to a reprehensible neglect in the matter of preparation. He is accused of lack of energy in his attempt to secure what we must regard as the uncoveted prize. His conviction of his inability to provide two people with the modern comforts and luxuries is offered as an excuse for him, but the indictment remains, and he languishes under the popular belief that the reason he is not married is because he has not tried to be.

But, above all things, let us be just! Let us consult competent authorities! The opinions which have been offered here come from older heads to whom circumstances have denied an esoteric understanding of the case. They have argued from a premise of unquestioned currency to the effect that when he proposes he accepts. As there are no outward or visible signs of this acceptance, ergo, he has not proposed.

It is time that this weight of odium should be removed from the estate of unaccustomed bachelorhood. These unfortunate young men have suffered in silence long enough. Their chivalrous assumption of the entire responsibility demands its reward.

The fact is that, except in rare cases, the popular denunciation falls on innocent heads. Careful mathematical enumeration based upon the records of the past of the second part—she—proves that these much-maligned young men have made the most praiseworthy efforts toward the preservation of the custom of marriage. Not content with one faltering attempt, they have returned again and again to the attack. Dejected in one direction, they have right-wheeled and left-wheeled and made fire-draw matches upon our citadels. With impartial zeal they have sought to hoist the flag of matrimony above some stronghold. It is not just nor kind that in the intervals of arduous pursuit they should be met with reflections upon their energy.

It is not desired by the air of insouciance with which they hide their round, the fact that they do not parade their sufferings, but let us not, therefore, be less pitiful. Let us boldly admit the truth, that it is the growing conservatism of the girl bachelor to which we must ascribe the failure of all these efforts.

This perplexing, startling, unmanageable, wholly delightful young woman has developed a shrewdness which quickly detects the weak points in her adversary—for the sake of preserving a metaphor the young man must be placed in his ungrateful position—and with an American conservatism she declines to give up a sure thing for an uncertainty. She enjoys a life full of freedom and repose, and she spreads a contagion of independence through all the ranks of feminine society.

The jolly little homes, in which the members of the new dispensation lead merry Bohemian existence, have very little in common with the traditional old maid's hall. Girl bachelors are as gregarious as a flock of birds, and they take to Bohemianism as a duck does to water.

New York is full of such little colonies. Many of them are composed of students, others of young women with manual professions, some of teachers, kindergarten, stenographers, and so on through the wide range of work and study which the great city affords. These little households meet for their daily meals from four to eight in the evening, and they combine their resources and their industry with the most gratifying results.

Not one of them would exchange her place in these cosy, snug and home-making groups for the flesh-pots of the East or the boarding house in the city. They describe their daily breakfasts, sketching expeditions, reunions at dinner, evening readings, occasional theater parties and jolly midnight spreads with a fervor and gusto which would scorn any unwary laudatory, and their admiration to every girl bachelor is an emphatic, "Go thou and do likewise."
