PRETTY WEDDING GOWN.

It Will Be Worn at the Altar by a Daughter of Havemeyer.

Chat by Ellen Osborn About the Oddities of Late Autumn Styles.

New Things Brought Out by Actresses—Winter Eccentricities Seen on the Broadway Promenade.

(Special Correspondence of THE INDEPENDENT.)

NEW YORK, NOV. 4.—MISS BLANCHE Havemeyer's wedding gown was pretty enough to tell you of. No, pretty is wrong. It was magnificent. If it had been pretty it would have accorded less well with the current notions of your humble servant. Miss Havemeyer was transformed into Mrs. J. Adair Campbell while wearing a point lace petticoat, worth more than I dare to figure, a court train of heavy white satin, and elaborate point lace bertha and a point lace veil caught with diamonds. She is fair-skinned, yellow-haired and well able to carry off such lavishness of adornment; but it must be set down in meekness that she and her good-looking Scotch bridegroom, who is said to be the handsomest of recent importations of husbands for American heiresses, were introduced into this article for no reason but to pave the way for the younger Miss Havemeyer, 14-year-old Miss Edythe, whose yellow bridesmaid's frock would make what the bride's gorgeousness would not—an excellent model for imitation.

Pretty little Miss Edythe waited upon circumstances had suggested to you that, perhaps, she stood for gold.

A very complete trousseau just on the edge of completion offers characteristic early winter costumes. One of the frocks best worth writing about because within the reach of the person best worth writing for—the average woman—is a dark green cloth gown cut to look curiously, as if it were a big pinafore over a dress of green blue velvet; the latter material really forming only the yoke and a deep band about the skirt, but being so arranged as to lend itself without question to the illusion. The prospective wearer is a tall fair girl who has ordered to wear with it a blue green tordador hat with iridescent plumes.

A dark blue cloth coat belongs to the same outfit. It is cut with loose fronts turned back with blue-green velvet revers and fastened down with big metal buttons, engraved with the features of that now somewhat monotonously familiar gentleman, C. Columbus, Esq. A deep mink border finished the bottom.

But I had no business to run away on this trousseau before I had properly done up my Tuxedo wedding. There was among the audience at St. Mary's a guest's costume not to be forgotten. If you wish to be quite in the mode this autumn consider it, for it catches the very spirit of prevailing fashions without carrying them to a disastrous extreme. You will find in the cut the requisite three or four inches added to the width of your shoulders by the approved flounce arranged with fullness on the top of your sleeves. You will find also, your sleeves, if you design to adopt the garment, bigger than your waist, unless, that is, you wear something bigger than a twenty-four-inch corset. You will find your collar high and your bodice skirts slashed in laps. You will find—but let us say at once the dress is of cream-brown faced cloth, richly embroidered in gold and brown about the bottom, and made with a brown velvet jacket over the front and waistband behind. It had lace sleeves over the silk ones and a deep flounce to trim the bottom. It was as neat a thing as I have seen in some weeks in the line of tea gowns.

Less practicable, but worth reading about, perhaps, was the house robe in which Mrs. Bernard Beere received a couple of callers the other day. It was 3:30, rehearsal was just over and the actress was resting in a white cloth princess gown, fastened with a gold belt over a pink and blue pompadour silk front, and showing a yoke outlined with swansdown. The sleeves were puffed and draped and more swansdown about the floor.

Rose Coghlan, by the way, has one very successful frock in "Dionysus." It's conventional enough in cut, and makes, but the tinting is unique and charming. The material is a shot silk which imitates to wonderful perfection the shades of the opal—white, pale blue, pink, flame gold. One color and then another, glances over it or through it, and when you think you have its picture in your eye, you look again and it is quite a different sort of concern. This unique silk is set with low pointed bodies, deep peasant belt of velvet and a flounce at the bottom.

The panorama on Broadway or the avenue is astonishing. People have got back to town and are out upon the street whenever the sun shines in their new winter clothes. There's a lot of scarlet and a lot of rich furs. One coat that caught my attention this morning was a long, fitting, seal-skin coat that was even more unusual with its blue brocade lining showing with every gust of wind a flowering of white, shading to yellow blossoms. Astrakhan fur was the trimming.

Bromway is just now the grand promenade for millinery. The bonnet of the season is, to say the least, peculiar. A very well-known woman was out a day or two ago in a lead-colored velvet skull cap edged with jet and with two little black feathers standing up in the air. The effect was interesting but not inspiring. Another example of the season's eccentricities was a dark green velvet poke bonnet worn by a pretty blonde and as big as the skull cap with a little black tinsel and blue eyes and dimples with its overarching gentle roof, adorned (3), like the other, with one or two standing feathers. If plain truth be told, needless of consequences, it's a long time since leadwear was so honestly and unpretentiously worn. May such a season be long in coming again.

Walking costumes are pleasant to write of. There's better stuff among them. A brown and yellow shot rep was one of my "finds" this morning. Its wearer came out in a jacket that had a square velvet yoke, and then was barred with velvet to the waist line. The sleeves, like all sleeves were balloon and then gauplets. With it she wore a yellow and a flat brown felt hat, lined with velvet and crowned with yellow pompons.

Another street exhibit was a plaid bengaline dress with a broad black silk girdle and black velvet bretelles. The cape to the sleeves and the collar were of heavy black Irish point tipped with silk balls.

There was, too, among the things to look at a tan-colored costume with a pointed trimming of a darker braid. The skirt was lifted coquettishly over a striped petticoat that showed brown and red shades. The bodice was of the striped stuff and over it was a short pocket with trimming and fastening under the left arm. The striped sleeves had deep capes of the tan cloth coming down over them and there was a velvet girdle knotted at the side.

A pretty "coming out" dress is all I have room left for. It is a plain white silk slip, cut in the Josephine fashion with a simple embroidery about the skirt, a little lace frill at the throat and lace ruffles hanging from the short puffed sleeves.

of a floral' ber-nous full of the inevitable yellow chrysanthemums. The frock had a plain and fairly short skirt with a dozen rows of rolled brown velvet cords about the bottom, and a jacket bodice that was thirty-second cousin to an Eton but stopped short at the waist and turned back in laps, which in their turn became frills on the shoulders. These laps and frills were edged, like the skirt, with velvet rolls. The boodice under the jacket had a square velvet yoke, and then was barred with velvet to the waist line. The sleeves, like all sleeves were balloon and then gauplets. With it she wore a yellow and a flat brown felt hat, lined with velvet and crowned with yellow pompons.
