Judge McClelland was occupied Tuesday in an important case. One Dennis Bell, a Donald Fowler for wages due as a sheep herder. Mr. Bell had been working for Mr. Fowler and there was no dispute as to the wages earned, but on the night of Nov. 19, while out with a band of sheep, Bell became lost and left the sheep at midnight and came to camp. While he was away wolves killed and injured fifty-six sheep, all but two of which died from the effects of the bites. Mr. Fowler thought Bell about pay for the sheep killed, which the latter refused to do. Judgment was rendered for Bell, but the judge, in deciding the case, said it was a case of negligence, and that inasmuch as Bell had stayed with the sheep until midnight, and it being a stormy night, he could not think that he had been guilty of a neglect. It was demonstrated in the case that a herder is liable for any neglect by reason of which sheep are lost or killed, but that in this particular case the herder had used due diligence in protecting the property entrusted to him.

There continues to be many deaths from the fever in San Antonio and Zacatecas.
