PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY.

It is admitted without controversy that the grange is essentially concerned with agriculture. What advantage, then, has the grange over farmers' clubs, agricultural societies, and similar associations, which have for their main purpose the same object? We answer, much every way, though both are social; both desire the advancement of agriculture, and through agriculture, the pecuniary good of the farmer.—Grange Bulletin.

There are many good farmers in the country who believe in the principles of the grange—who wish it success—but who have never yet united with it. Now, these friends are all the time losing more in a great many ways than they know of. They mean to join the grange some time, but they think they can't spare the money, or, perhaps, the time to join just yet. But any one who will use the grange rightly will find he can save money and save time by belonging to it; so that those persons who find time and money short are the very ones who ought to belong to the grange.—The Live Patron.

WORTHY Master Strange, of the Montgomery county, Ohio, grange, in a late address, held the following: Should the grange eventually die entirely out (which I do not fear), I feel sure the farmers will be amply repaid for all time and expense with the order, by the independent and manly chain of thought which the grange has led to, to say nothing of the social and pecuniary benefits which it has been the means of rendering. The grange has, to a large extent, made the farmer a thinking man. His eyes have been opened, so that he can see the relation he bears to other professions. He is not now simply a tool for the lawyer and politician, but the true patron is in every sense of the word, a man among men.
