ONE spends much more time on negligee through the long summer months than during the busy winter when shopping, bridge, business, teas and cotillions consume the afternoon hours, which in summer are deliciously idle. Cool, pretty negligees are, therefore, an important item of the warm-weather wardrobe, and the wise woman has plenty of these dainty, informal garments made up in washable materials, knowing that immaculate freshness and daintiness even in one's bed-chamber helps to lighten the burden of the sultry summer days.

Pretty Negligees for Breakfast En Famille.

If the summer is to be spent quietly at home or in the retirement of one's own bungalow or country house, great comfort may be had in half a dozen cool, simple little "breakfast frocks," more presentable to the public eye than a boudoir gown or a kimono intended, of course, for only room wear, yet with all the loose, informal ease of a dressing gown.

These little breakfast gowns are made of flower-printed or dotted lawn, of cross-barred lawn and of sprigged dainty. These are fashioned all in one piece, with bodice and skirt joined by an inch-wide ribbon heading of embroidery. The bodice may be laid in folds or gathered at the shoulder seams, and the skirt should be moderately full at the bottom with a deep hem and tucks above. The neck may be cut out in a little square or in V shape with a turban collar. Such a breakfast negligee, made up of inexpensive printed lawn in a pretty rosebud pattern, with rose-colored ribbon belt and bows, should cost but a trifle and will be delightfully cool and fresh, as well as very easily adjusted on hot summer mornings.

Negligees for the Summer Hotel.

If the summer is to be spent at a hotel or large boarding house, the little breakfast gown, of course, cannot be worn; but there should be a more informal garment for possible breakfasts in one's room, and cool, comfortable peignoirs in which to lounge during the "afternoon nap" hour, in the heat of the day. Such negligees do not make any pretense of being other than they are—loose, comfortable peignoirs—in which one would not dream of appearing outside of one's room. They may be in kimono style of thin silk or batiste, or they may be—and these are daintiest of all—of sheer white lawn or dainty, all affluff with soft frills and gay with fluttering ribbons. Lace insertions and medallions are so cheap now that a perfect dream of a negligee may be contrived for a few dollars, and the cut of these loose garments is so simple that a generous amount of lace trimming may be put on with very little labor.

Negligee Wear is Limp and Graceful.

Very fine embroideries are also charming on boudoir negligees; but as very limp, soft effects are the rule, only the finest embroideries may be used, the coarser sorts becoming too heavy after a laundering. Two bewitching boudoir gowns are shown among the illustrations, and both of these garments have been designed for a bride of the early summer. The seated figure shows a rose pink negligee of very thin Japanese silk, as cool as batiste, and this negligee, while being unmistakably a boudoir garment, is made a bit more formal in character by the style of the sleeve and by the shirring which confines the garment at the waist. This rose pink negligee came from Paris and is rather elaborate in style, but though quantities of lace have been used, the general design could be copied very easily. The flounce in graduated layers, and reaching well above the knees, gives the skirt very beautiful, flowing lines, and the "angel" sleeves—falling over smaller, puffed sleeves to the elbow, are charmingly graceful.

The other peignoir, of pale blue messaline satin, is cut most simply, the lace trimming covering almost the whole surface and giving the garment a very rich and elaborate character. Neither of these handsome negligees will be able to visit the wash tub, and only a bride—who is allowed special extravagance in her belongings— or the woman with a very long purse, may indulge in the luxury of such boudoir garb. Most of us have to be content with pretty peignoirs of tub material, and there is no reason why these should not be equally as becoming and charming as the more impressive affairs of silk or satin. Either of the two negligees shown could be copied with good success in plain colored silk mull or lace, and the cost should be but a trifle.

Negligees That Go a Visiting.

When one and one's hostess sit around before bedtime "cosying," as our English cousins say, for the benefit of one's hostess and all the other women present, one's most distracting negligee is donned. So exquisitely beautiful are some of these room garments that one does not wonder at the darning prices asked for them by their designers. In some of the better class shops one may pick up very lovely peignoirs and boudoir gowns which are copied from French models, yet are not marked with prohibitive prices for the average pocketbook, and if one is invited to spend a week, or even a week-end, at a very smart country house, the prettiest negligee one can provide must be carried along. Some of the boudoir gowns worn at these week-end "cosyings" are hard to tell from dinner gowns so closely have the deep drapery and tulle effects of the present mode been followed. There are lace laces falling full length over crepe de chine and satin slips, and there are gorgeous satin coats mounted over lace-like underdresses.

A much admired negligee of the latter style was the one worn by Miss Frances Starr in "The East-By-Sea." This negligee includes a trailing gown of lovely lining, made of pure white chiffon, honeycombed with lace and falling straight from neck to heels over a slip of soft mousseline. Over this chiffon tulle—a complete and charming negligee in itself—was worn a dashing coat of bright eliel blue satin—almost turquoise in shade. The coat fastened at the bust with a single loop and button, and slanting away to show the robe beneath, fell to the wearer's feet in the back.

Even the Negligee Built With a Coat Now.

This coat had in negligee wear as very pronounced. Tea coats are very smart, indeed; and now, instead of using the term "dressing sack," one might go farther and say that one's little "room coat." Some of the room coats shown in the little accompanying French shops are dainty, and may be picked up at surprisingly reasonable prices, considering their Paris origin. Many of them, for wear while the toilette is being done, are of washable lawn or dotted Swiss with loose sleeves which slip up on the arms, and a graceful poplin over the hips, joined to the upper portion by a ribbon run beading. To slip on hastily when one comes in on a warm afternoon, and strips off the fitted frock of silk or mohair, there are delightful lace or ribbon coats, and one of these is shown. Strips of tub lace and soft blue satin ribbon are run together by hand, and the sleeves are simple extensions of the short-waisted bodice, four wedge-shaped panels being set in to give the sleeve a flaring effect at the bottom. The short-waisted upper portion is attached to a coat skirt section in which the ribbon and lace are set on the bias.

Negligee capes are also ready to throw over the shoulders when one is summoned during the toilette, by a knock at the door, or when a brief trip through a hallway must be made from room to room. A very graceful cape of this sort is made of sheer habutai silk, and is quite short in front, rounding downward toward the back, where it falls far below the waist. All around the edge of the cape is a full ruffle inset with lace insertions, and this ruffle is caught together with the blue ribbon beneath the arms to form a loose sleeve. Similar ribbons tie the cape at the bust. It is the matter of an instant to slip the cape over the shoulders and nothing over devised in negligee wear could be more charmingly feminine and becoming.

When a Shirtwaist Becomes a Negligee.

One thrifty little woman hit upon a capital plan for making her discarded shirtwaists do duty as charming negligee saccos. The sheer blouse usually wears away first over the shoulders and around the collar, and no matter how daintily the mending is done it spoils the blouse for anything but home wear. The worn portion this woman cut away, making her negligee V shaped at the neck. The blouse, which, like most of last season's styles, buttoned down the back, was slashed open down the front, and the back was joined together by a panel of embroidery or lace insertion. Lace frilling or fine embroidery flouncing then made a ruffle all around the little saccos and the sleeves, cut off to elbow length, or shorter, were finished by a similar frill. With gay ribbon bows fastening the front and fluttering on the short, frilly sleeve, this shirtwaist saccos became a very captivating little garment indeed.

Negligees for Traveling Quite in Style.

The woman of refined taste always wears very inconspicuous raiment when traveling, and negligees of lace, diaphanous character and bright colorings are not donned by true gentlewomen when in the public eye. A traveling kimono pretty enough to be— as the Irishman said after a train wreck—"the most charming part of the accident" is made of natural colored pongee with neat trimmings of navy blue fougled dotted with white. This "kimono," which is designed for use on the sleeper on a long "cross-continent" trip, is edged down the front with bands of the dotted foulard, and a turnover collar of the foulard may be left loosely open or tied snugly about the throat with the blue necktie attached. The sleeves, while very roomy, are not in loose kimono style, but are in bishop shape, with wide cuffs of the blue foulard. This garment fastens securely all the way down the front, and there are deep pockets into which may be slipped small articles which must be carried to the sleeping car dressing room.

Dinner Gown or Tea Gown.

So beautiful are the tea coats and gowns for summer afternoon wear at home or, as the French say, "chez soi" (with one's self) that only a connoisseur in things sartorial can assert whether they are afternoon or evening gowns. The classic drapery effects were seized upon immediately by the artistic designers of negligee wear. For these graceful, flowing lines, of course, lend themselves particularly well to the soft, limp materials of which tea gowns are made.

A blue dotted net tunic over pale blue silk mousseline and topped by a blue satin coat embroidered with pearls in gorgeous enough for a dinner costume. A tea gown of black net encrusted with white lace medallions and mounted over apple green satin is indescribably elegant and distinguished in character. The lines of these tea gowns cleverly suggest every line and curve of the figure without ever hinting at a snug lining or a whalebone, and white having ample fullness about the feet, these robes fall in long, limp, graceful folds about the limbs, with trailing length upon the floor. Sometimes fringed scarfs or broad, soft sashes are knotted about the hips or run through sashes in the material, the ends falling heavily over the skirt.

Bridal Tea Gowns.

A most lovely bridal tea gown of blue chiffon cloth has a cream lace over tulle which hangs in straight lines over the pale blue slip. This lace tulle is buttoned down the back with small lace crocheted buttons, and through slits cut in the lace are buttonholes at the angles. A naive satin ribbon is threaded, descending under the arms to tie in a loose knot with hanging ends at the back of the hips. A similar ribbon passes through sashes in the lace tulle just below the hips, the ends of the ribbon being tied at the sides in soft, drooping bows. The sleeves are of tucked blue chiffon and the neck is cut out in a little square. The lace tulle is not joined under the arms except by the ribbon bows at the hips, and the girlish grace and loveliness of this rich yet simple robe can scarcely be imagined. Another bridal or "trousseau" tea gown shows a coat of white net mounted over a whole frock of similar material. Both coat and frock are embroidered with dots in band effects and crocheted holly edge the panels of the coat. Pin tucking and Val insertion add to the daintiness of this charming costume, of which a photograph is shown.

The tea gown of white albatross is very dainty, and has a trifle more warmth than the thin affair of net or silk. Such a tea gown may be donned on the chilly summer afternoons in the mountains when rain and wind without make a cozy tea hour over a wood fire very delightful. The graceful folds from neck to hem, is daintily by the hand-embroidered scalloping which trims the upper portion. The sleeves and little collarless yoke are white tucked mull.

Soft and Limp Effects in Lingerie.

The process of elimination, as applied to undergarment, has been so thorough that now we may consider ourselves lucky to be allowed two garments to our back. And if the few things we are permitted to not slumphy enough to crush into a ball within our flats, they will never meet the test of the new gown's skin tightness. But if the underthings of the moment are soft as down and fine as cobwebs, they are certainly not plain. Quantities of beautiful lace in medallions and insertions are set into sheer fabric and hand and machine-made embroideries of exquisite delicacy are used. Fabulous prices are paid by smart women for the fragile lingerie petticoats which are worn now beneath even street tailored costumes of wool and mohair, silk and satin skirts which have had a long reign of practical usefulness, having been completely ousted by the lingerie styles. Some of these snowy petticoats, seen below the lifted street frocks, are so luxurious in character that one feels it is actually sinful to expose anything so lovely to the grime and hard wear of the pavements, and that such petticoats should be kept for ballroom frocks, or for wear with dainty negligees which would at least reveal their beauty.

Two flounces are generally used on these lingerie petticoats for street wear, and these flounces may be attached separately to a deep flounce or may be attached one to the other, as in the petticoat illustrated today. Lace trimmings, fortunately, are reserved for evening petticoats, those for street use being trimmed with very fine machine embroideries in imitation of hand effects on mull or handkerchief linen.

or finished only with scalloped ruffles. The French woman of refinement is very partial to petticoat flounces of sheer material delicately scalloped at the edge or ornamented simply with hand embroidered dots. Ready scalloped strips of batiste and mull may now be obtained in most embroidery departments, and two of these soft ruffles over a similarly scalloped strip make a beautiful and not too elaborate street skirt.

Les dessous—or as Elizabeth calls them in her "Visit to America"—include now but three pieces; the soft chemise of embroidered mull or—if one can afford it—shirred Italian silk like the beautiful— and such only—she will be able to stand, walk and sit with distinguished grace and ease, and will possess to the utmost of human possibility the prevailing lines of the mode for which that corset was built. Few women realize the importance of having corsets refitted. It is incredible how many otherwise intelligent women purchase a corset after simply looking at it in the shop, or upon the advice of a friend who has found it satisfactory. In many cases the shortening of a bone here, the inserting of a gore there, or some other trifling alteration will give just the desired line and perfect ease in a corset that otherwise is just a mite too long or too high to be comfortable. The new corsets, most women will be glad to learn, are much lower in the bust than those which have been considered correct during the past few seasons. It is wisest, also, that waists are to be "nipped in," as the corset after expressed. It already some of the French dressmakers who are launching the new "Luis and Watteau" effects, are advising that the corset laces be loosened over the hips and drawn more tightly at the waist. As long, however, as the slender, straight lines of the Moyen Age frock remain popular it is probable that hiplessness will be considered more elegant than a tiny waist measure.

The Aeroplane Dress.

French women, who seem far ahead of some of the rest of their sisters in courage, make frequent trips—or should one say flights into the upper air. The aeroplane journey calls for a special costume—as every pastime in France does—and the aeroplane dress is something like an exaggerated gymnastium suit with full bloomers instead of a skirt. These bloomers fasten about the knees and the full material base over, covering the limbs almost entirely. And instead of the gym suit blouse there is a neatly fitted Moyen Age bodice coming below the hips, at which point the bloomers are attached.

The most impressive exhibition on the grounds at the Seattle world's fair is the miracle painting "In the Shadow of the Cross," by Henry Hammond Ahl. It is to be seen in the Swedish building. The picture is of Christ and the outlines of the figure and the cross may be distinctly seen in the darkness. So bright is the light radiating from the picture that a photograph has been made of the picture by this light.
