NOVELIST WILL VISIT
MISSOULA THIS WEEK

Hardin Garland, the novelist, who is now inspecting with District Forester Silcox the Absaroka forest, will be in Missoula late in the week. Yesterday a letter in which Mr. Garland announced his intention of coming to Missoula was received at the local offices of the service. It is apparent from the novelist's outlines of his plans that a Garland novel, in which the forest service furnishes the setting, will be written soon. Mr. Garland is making a thorough examination of the service methods, and will spend a short time in western Montana. His visit in Missoula will be brief. From here he expects to go to Darby for a trip through the Bitter Root forest. A longer visit here may follow the inspection of the valley forestry camps.

WAYSIDE QUIXOTE IS MISSOULA'S
SHERIFF

BILL KELLEY RESCUES THREE HELPLESS YOUNG LADIES FROM SORROWFUL PLIGHT.

Sheriff William Kelley now has qualified as a Don Quixote. The role in which the sheriff is most accustomed to appear is that of the stern upholder of the law; but his most recent adventure was of an entirely different nature. The sheriff didn't tell the story himself, it became public property in some mysterious fashion.

Last Saturday three Missoula young ladies, whose names it wouldn't be safe to mention, started with a staid old family horse on a day's outing. They drove up the Rattlesnake several miles, unhitched their steed and spent the whole of a pleasant, sunshiny day along the banks of the creek. It was late in the afternoon before the return trip was started.

The young lady to whom the horse belonged confessed herself a little doubtful as to the proper method of harnessing the steed, but declared with the newly-awakened feminine independence of which one hears so much that a simple set of harness shouldn't puzzle a mind to which the mysteries of the modern, three-ring gown are as an open book. Still, there seemed to be more to the harness as it lay upon the ground than was in evidence while a horse had been enclosed in it.

Through the use of a good deal of ingenuity involving the loosening of some straps, and the tightening of others, the picnicers finally managed to get all of the harness on the horse. The ladylike old steed objected with creaking kicks and unaccustomed cavortings and the finished product did not have that smooth, complete appearance which usually marks a harnessed horse, but everything was on and the ladies decided that the horse must have overaten during the day or otherwise have unfitted himself for his trappings.

When the horse was backed into the buggy, though, it became painfully evident that something was wrong. The shafts stuck straight up in the air in such a way that when navigation was attempted they descended about the horse's ears and caused unquellable merriment. All efforts to cure the mysterious defect failed. The shafts pointed toward the heavens and the old horse stood still.

At last the pilgrims were forced to get out of the buggy. Two of them went to the horse's head, and, with the third trailing along in the dust behind, the moorful towardward march commenced. For several miles the party journeyed in this way. Then the two women who were escorting the unwilling steed refused to go farther. They bade their companion go on down the road to find a man versed in the art of horse-harnessing.

Reluctantly the rear guard left the discouraged caravan. For half an hour she walked down the road. At last she came to a little ranch into whose front gate an old German man was just driving. Timidly the envoy asked the rancher if he would go up the road a couple of miles and harness a horse for her. The old German looked her over for several minutes, then granted and kept on through the gate. "It's a hell of a driver (this is a true story and the truth mustn't be obscured) who can't hitch up a horse," he growled as he went on.

For another half hour the young lady walked. By this time she had reached the settled district near the county poorfarm. Suddenly she heard the whir of an automobile behind her. She stepped to the side of the road and waved her arms in a frantic endeavor to stop the motorist. The man in the car gave her an automobile glance, then threw her a kiss and went speeding on toward town. Deep despair followed. The footsore traveler sat by the road and wept. Then came another automobile. This one stopped and Sheriff Kelley got out. He listened sympathetically to the moorful tale, then loaded the young lady into his machine and went back up the road.

When he reached the disheartened expedition Kelley's restraining kindness gave way. He lay back in his car and wept for sheer joy. Never had a horse been so harnessed before. Everything except the bit was in the wrong place. It was half an hour before the damage could be repaired, but at last the horse was properly harnessed, greatly to his apparent relief, and the picnicers started home.

If the equal suffrage amendment ever passes, the voters of the state, Sheriff Kelley can count on three votes even if public opinion turns overwhelmingly against him.
