TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1914.

All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes That slumber on its bosom. —Bryant.

LOOKING UP "It's always morning somewhere."

When William Cullen Bryant wrote the lines which are quoted this morning at the top of this column, he expressed the idea which we now convey in the term "minority control."

But not all of the sleepers are buried. There are lots of them who are alive, to the extent that they breathe and eat and walk about.

Sometimes the sleepers wake sufficiently to complain about the way things are being run, but their indignation never carries them to the extent of breaking into the game and lending a hand to move things the right way—as they see it.

The busy minority is entitled to credit for its activity. If that activity sometimes takes a direction which is not to the liking of the sleepers, the busy minority is not to be blamed.

The sleepers have no right to complain over the result of election or over the adoption of a certain policy, if they have made no effort in the election or in the framing of the policy, more than to talk about them.

The dead ones may outnumber us in the census count, but those of us who move about and have being are the ones who have the fun.

Some of the sleepers have been a long time dead and some have just started on the job. But the latter are just as dead as the ones who are ahead of them in the line.

It's a great opportunity which is given to each of us during the time he is "treading the globe" But the opportunity will be missed if we do not keep busy while we are on the job.

A DEGRADED SERVICE

In his astonishing plea to congress for repeal of the clause exempting American coasting vessels from Panamanian tolls, President Wilson confessed that grave problems had risen in our foreign relations.

These incidents emphasize the fact that complications have multiplied and have become acute since the diplomatic service, under this administration, has been subjected to the spoils system in its crudest form and with all its disorganizing and degrading effects.

That creditable sense of generous trust toward a new president, which is characteristic of American people, has led the public to look leniently upon the debauchery of the diplomatic service.

The consular service was long ago organized on a basis of efficiency; its work shows direct results in the way of business. The diplomatic service does not so readily translate itself in terms of dollars and cents and has, therefore, been treated by the public with good-natured contempt.

The present administration, of course, did not invent this disgusting spoils system but it has applied it as shamelessly and as disastrously as any machine-made administration that ever sat in Washington.

But our diplomacy has been far less discredited by weakness in the headquarters of the department than by the open adoption of the spoils system in place of the system of regular promotion on a basis of merit which Mr. Bryan found in operation and which had been in effect since the Roosevelt order of 1905.

Thus the embassy and legation secretaryships were withdrawn from patronage and secretaries of proved ability were gradually advanced until they became ministers.

And at one blast of Bryanism this system was destroyed. From the time that statesman took office until now he has openly and deliberately flouted the requirements of experience and merit and has displaced one capable, trained minister after another with appointees whose selection paid political debts or purchased political support for the administration.
