"HUNTING THE FOX."

Curious Military Maneuvers of the Old "Uninformed" Militia.
 According to so good an authority as the late General J. Watts de Peyster, our grandfathers practiced a maneuver at their annual "general training" that was perhaps the acme of military absurdity. His description of it is quoted in his biography by Mr. Frank Allaben: "In Cooperstown I saw a general training of the old fashioned 'uninformed' militia, as some people, ignorantly inserting a second 'n,' used to call them, not altogether without justice. The concluding evolution was intricate, but not calculated to inspire respect for the warriors who executed it. It was called 'hunting the fox.' A distinguished officer, all lace and buttons and wearing a very tall feather, led a long line of patriotic citizens, armed with gleaming bayonets, in single or Indian file, to the sound of martial music. The leader made himself the spindle of a spiral movement, until the warriors, who had previously been formed round an open square, were wound up round him like a tight watch spring.
 I wondered how they could ever untwist themselves, when the commander gave an order in a voice like Ajax defying the thunderbolt, and—they all sat down in one another's laps! The effect was startling. I looked up to my father with inquiring eyes. Even he was impressed. He made a gesture of silence and attention. The music had ceased. Then I saw the magnificent plume rise like the head of a jack in the box when the spring is touched. He gave another order, and round him rose that coil of armed men; and as they rose music's voluptuous swell—or rather voluminous swell, for the majority of instruments were drums—filled the whole air with sonorous sounds, and I saw that magnificent plume unwind the coil with the same majesty with which it had wound it up.

THE HISTORY OF MANKIND.
 It May Fill a Library or Be Told in a Very Few Words.
 Anatole France tells us the story of a certain Eastern king, who was young and conscientious when he ascended the throne of his fathers, and therefore calling together the most learned doctors in the land he bade them write a history of mankind, "for," he said, "if I would rule aright I must know the story of things past and of kingdoms come and gone." The doctors bowed and went their way.
 Thirty years passed, and the king had forgotten his command, when to his palace came a train of fifty camels bearing each ten mighty volumes. The king asked the chief doctor, Zeb, what the train might mean.
 "It is the history of mankind," replied the sage.
 The king bade them return and abridge the history so that he might read it and not spend the residue of his life upon the task.
 Ten years more passed when the doctors returned with five camels bearing each ten mighty volumes. The king, grown old and irritable, bade them to abridge the history into one book, "for," said he, "I have a great desire to read the history before I die."
 The doctors began their toil again. Many died, and while the book was still unfinished, the king, too, fell sick with a mortal malady. On his deathbed he summoned Zeb, for a consuming desire had come upon him to know the history before his spirit left him. The doctor came.
 "I die in sorrow," said the king, "for I have not learned the history of mankind."
 As the king sank back the doctor bent over him and whispered, "Men were born, they suffered, and then they died."—Henry Watterson in Louisville Courier-Journal.

It requires only two men in place of five or ten—makes work easier—cuts out the before-dusk and after-dark drudging chores. That's how saved.

You can do your work when and how you want it done—harvest your crop when the ripe, before it goes down or shells out. That's how saved.

You can cut out the feed bills—pay fuel bills out of hand and labor saved—that's expense saved.
