

FIRST EDITION

BY THE GULF CABLE.

Later Advances from the West Indies and Mexico.

One Hundred Earthquake Shocks in a Week.

Dec. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10.

HAYTI.

The Rebels Preparing to Invade Hayti.

Havana, Dec. 10.—A brother of General Leon Montes, who is kept in jail at Cape Haytien, is reported to have gone back to St. Domingo from Jamaica, and to be heading eight thousand Haytian rebel troops on the frontier.

Popular Clamor in Favor of Gouffard and Other Exiles.

Havana, Dec. 10.—We have the report from Hayti that the people there demand of the Government the annulment of the decree that keeps Gouffard and others in exile.

PORTO RICO.

One Hundred and Fourteen Shocks of Earthquake in a Week.

Havana, Dec. 10.—The steamers Barcelona and Cacique arrived yesterday at Santiago de Cuba from St. Johns, P. R. The earthquakes continued on that island, and one hundred and fourteen shocks were reported during the course of eight days.

VENEZUELA.

Reports of an Earthquake at Caracas.

Havana, Dec. 10.—By the way of Porto Rico we have the announcement that an earthquake took place at Caracas, Venezuela, at daybreak November 14, and likewise a contradictory report as to the same.

MEXICO.

Stormy Weather at Vera Cruz.

Havana, Dec. 10.—The steamer Georgia has arrived here from Vera Cruz, and on the 4th inst. The weather at that port was very stormy when the Georgia left, and, as the post office was closed, no papers were received. The steamer Fabrice, however, is daily expected here from Vera Cruz.

VIRGINIA.

Proceedings of the State Convention—The Steamship Hatters Missing—The New Masonic Temple—Important Law Case.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10.—The following standing committees were ordered to-day by the Virginia State Convention—On the preamble, bill of rights and division of powers of government; on the legislative department; on the elective franchise and the qualifications for office; on the basis of representation and apportionment; on the executive department of the country and corporation courts and county officers; on education and the funds relating thereto; on taxation and finance; on county and corporation courts and county organization; on limitation of powers of the State, including the courts and insurance companies; on public institutions; on prisons and the prevention and punishment of crime; on military affairs; on the pardoning power; on agricultural and industrial interests and immigration; on future revision and amendment of the Constitution; on schedule. Two committees will be appointed to-morrow, and the work of framing a constitution will then commence.

Resolutions were adopted requiring the Second Auditor of the State to prepare for the use of the Convention a tabular statement, showing—First, the total costs to the State of its interest in each canal and railroad up to the 1st of December, 1867, including legal interest, and the total amount of income, if any, arising from such interest in each canal and each railroad, and received by the State up to the 1st of December, 1867; third, the total amount of the debt of the State, including the accrued interest, up to the 1st of December, 1867, specifying how much of said debt was incurred for each canal and each railroad, including the accrued interest as aforesaid, the time or times it was incurred, and the date of the maturity thereof.

The following preamble and resolution on the subject of the oath to be required of members were laid on the table:—

Resolved, In view of the fact that before the canvass commenced in this Commonwealth, it was clearly and distinctly understood that the test oath, known as the "iron-clad," would not be enforced or required of members.

Resolved, That this Convention will not and ought not to receive any member who has taken such a qualification of his members to seats on this floor.

The following resolution was referred:—

Resolved, That the Committee on Limitation and Guarantees be instructed to report upon the expediency of incorporating in the Constitution a provision securing the rights of property and enlarging the civil capacities of married women.

Information from Richmond to-night states that the volunteer officers in the Freedmen's Bureau, in Virginia, who are ordered to be mustered out of service on the 1st of January, will, it is understood from District headquarters, be retained as civilians in the service of the Government in that Bureau until that institution is dispensed with.

The steamer Hatters, of the Richmond and New York steamship line, which was due here yesterday, has not arrived, and it was not heard from since she left New York. Serious fears are entertained for her safety.

A large number of delegates to the Conservative Convention to-morrow have arrived. The Convention will be a very large one.

The corner-stone of a new Masonic Temple in Richmond was laid to-day by the Grand Master of the State, with imposing ceremonies. A large crowd of persons were present. The address was delivered by Rev. J. Burro, who was followed by the Rev. J. Burro, who was followed by the Rev. J. Burro.

In the case of the Merchants' Bank of Baltimore against the Valley Bank of Virginia, now on trial in Richmond, Judge Underwood decided in favor of the plaintiffs on the two points raised by counsel, and ordered an injunction to be issued restricting Mr. Brent, trustee, and Mr. Vance Brown, President of the Exchange Bank of Richmond, is appointed receiver. This case involves many intricate points of law and nearly a million of dollars.—N. Y. Herald.

The Danish press is highly satisfied with the sale of the West Indian Islands to America. All parties agree in wishing that the $10,000,000 now received may be put by against the next war with Prussia. This one idea predominates at Copenhagen.

FROM EUROPE BY STEAMER.

BISMARCK ON FREE SPEECH.

Interesting Debate in the Prussian Chamber of Deputies.

In the sitting of the Prussian Chamber of Deputies on the 29th ult., the motion of Herr Lassen proposing to quash the trial of Herr Westeu by a special law, and to modify article 84 of the Prussian Constitution, so as to make it consistent with the Constitution of the North German Confederation, came on for discussion.

Herr von Hovebeck proposed that the House should proceed to the order of the day. Herr von Bennigsen supported the motion of Herr Lassen.

Count von Leppe, the Minister of Finance, stated that the members should await the decision of the Superior Court, which would be possible to determine what measures were fitting to be adopted on the occasion.

Count Bismarck said that he expressed his own personal conviction, and not that of the Government, in saying that the subject was of no practical importance to the question. The conflict between the Chamber and the Government had arisen from a misapprehension of the freedom of speech.

The question now was how to prevent the renewal of the misunderstanding between the Government and the Chamber; he proposed to consider whether it was not possible to discuss the present case without any restriction of liberty of speech, and the right of the newspapers to publish the speech.

He was desirous of freeing the constitutional life of the kingdom from all such restrictions, and he made them read to his readers;—and therein consists the spell that he wields, no less as an actor than as a writer.

In reflecting upon the readings that he has given, the conviction of his absolute truthfulness comes home to the mind of the speaker.

He has worn no mask. He has been an honest artist, from the first; and what he is doing now is only the natural outgrowth of what he has been doing all the days of his life.

He has witnessed the spontaneous expression of a great nature in the maturity of its greatness. There is something fine and touching in the spectacle of a life so earnest and so true.

Those who have seen the Sovereign Pontiff deliver his benediction to Rome and to the world at Easter from the Loggia, officiate at the grande messe at the high altar in St. Peter's, or when he kneels in prayer before the altar, such lucky ones will doubtless ever preserve a lively recollection of the grandeur and religious solemnity of the occasion.

But to see Pius the Ninth arise, to understand his true character, to appreciate his holiness as it is in his vestments of purple and gold, and imagine him simply clad in a long habit of creamy white, seated in a cosy arm-chair at a table covered with papers and documents, in a room where the atmosphere is fresh and furnished into such an apartment is a new and a delightful thing.

It was here I spent the delightful half hour which I shall always remember with the deepest sense of pleasure and gratification. It was late when I entered—past 4 o'clock, while the lamp in the centre of the table gave a dull light to the room, though quite sufficient to enable me to observe every feature and every little movement of my august host.

All the world has seen the Pope's face in a mirror; but though his photograph resembles him in certain degrees, yet there are features sometimes too impartial—and in the present case you lose the whole benevolent expression of the eyes which ever light up the dignified countenance.

I saw him:—He looks about seventy years old—his age is seventy-five—middle-aged, and though rather inclining to corpulence, yet of a frame still retaining a muscular power. Little tiny dimpling hands, and a little tiny feet, of which any lady would be proud. A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed and put aside at will, but one of real Christian hope and resignation, ever suggestive of the true character of the man.

When one looks at the Pope, one is reminded of the words of the poet:— "The little twinkling hands, and the little twinkling feet, of which any lady would be proud." A face one cannot look upon without loving—so mild it is and benevolent; the large eyes, and the smile playing about the mouth—so amiable not assumed