

NEW YORKISMS.

From Our Own Correspondent. The most elegant and legitimate way of attending a free feed is to invite yourself to one of the real estate sales that are constantly taking place in one of the suburbs. When you read that of ground to be disposed of at auction in West Rensselaer, Rye, or Hoboken, or any of the twenty other suburbs that surround New York, all you need to do is put on an extra supply of check, and go in. Scores of people who haven't a penny to lay out in real estate, and who never will have, do so week after week, and there is always a liberal supply of young mothers who seize the occasion to supply their babies with fresh air and gratis "good things." The free feeds are the great attractions of the suburban auction sales. At some they even go to the extreme of supplying champagne and sherry; at most they content themselves with a wineless and liquorless cold collation, consisting of sandwiches, salads, cream, and pastry, lemonade (and not very strong lemonade) being the only beverage with which the guests are expected to "liquorize."

Two suicides yesterday. Pistol and pison are the chosen quieteners that warm weather. One of the suicides was a despairing woman who "couldn't make her rent," and whose drunken husband had fortuitously drawn from the bank all the money she had deposited there. Another was a despairing conchanner, who was moved to the deed by similar pecuniary reasons. The frequency of similar speakers very little about the one to come. I suppose, long before they reach the crisis, they come to the conclusion that things cannot be much worse elsewhere than they are here. They become pessimists, and gradually they develop into self-destructors, and gradually get worked up to the necessary point, until at length they look upon the miseries that surround them and a shudder, and look upon the poison—and resolve!

Are you aware that there are about sixteen hundred theatrical bill boards in this city? Two firms monopolize the business for all the places of amusement, each establishment paying an average of fifteen dollars per week. Pugilism by gaslight was the only remedy which two ruffians yesterday morning saw out of their difficulties. After interchanging for some time the choicest refinements in anathemas, in Third avenue, they adjourned to a vacant lot on Fourth avenue, and there casting aside all superfluous garments, prepared to pursue their art in true prize-fighting style. It was about 3 o'clock in the morning. The stars were twinkling in the sky—and some metropolitan stars were twinkling round the corner. These latter luminaries did about half as much good as they might have done, and arrested one of the principals and one of the seconds.

It is said that Carlotta Patti is coming to this country in the fall. She has been wandering in Europe, north as far as Stockholm, and south as far as Constantinople, and now wishes to repeat, in the United States, successes which have only been second to those of her phenomenal sister Adolina. It was this Carlotta who, when she was last in Philadelphia, was disgusted with the smallness and iciness of the audience. She vowed she would either never go there again, or that it should not be until they had learned how to appreciate her better. Have Philadelphia ever learned better, I wonder? They are cold, very cold—and even when something extraordinary comes along they are not always proportionally warmed.

I have never described at any length one of the new institutions at the Central Park. This is a Moorish temple, the ground color of whose exterior is brown. The roof is domed, and is sprinkled with stars over a pale blue sky. Almost every kind of mineral drink that can be had, and every other kind of water are all to be had. The celebrated watering-places of the world have their niches in its handsome Moorish temple. The proprietors were not allowed to set it up without having paid a considerable sum of money to the treasurer of the park. The temple was put up at their own expense, and a portion of the profits goes into the Central Park treasury. "For that are we doctors." No less than twenty different mineral drinks flow from the congeries of fountains there. Their "alterative" properties are enough to make an Ethiopian transmute his epidermis of the leopard's skin. To use an old simile, the Central Park, when this institution is held in view, is like looking at health and country living through the small end of the opera-glass. They look a long way off, although you see them so plainly.

A romantic incident, which is not generally known, has occurred within the last few days in this city. The romantic-minded poetess, standing Broadway and Fifth avenues, particularly along Broadway, will remember an Italian family of wandering musicians, consisting of a man, his wife, and a child. The man played the violin, the woman branched a tamborine, the child sang and accompanied himself on the harp. There were some points remarkable about the child. One was the total absence of resemblance to his parents. They were dark and swarthy; their features were crisscrossed with the genuine Italian blood. He was a blonde—of the Niblo's garden style—with yellow hair and broad, light blue eyes, cheeks like finest satin, and lips like rosybud transmutated into flesh, in answer to some Pygmalion-like prayer. He was apparently about fifteen. His clothes were torn; his hair was tangled, and his ensemble was tattered; but through his rags and his wretchedness there shone forth the royalty of beauty. His voice, too, was almost phenomenal. I have often seen him surrounded by a crowd of men, women, and children, who greeted his performances with such a shout as some unappreciated prima donna might be glad to awaken. Not only pennies but greenbacks fell into the hat which his father carried around. Contrary to the popular delusion in regard to street-singers, he was treated extremely well by his father and mother. No blows, no threats, but kisses from his mother, encouragement from his father, kindness from both. Well, one afternoon, not very many days ago, a wealthy but eccentric lady, whom the sequel proved to have laid her plans well, beckoned to him from her carriage window as he was passing up Fifth avenue. At that moment he was alone. It was one of those rare times when his parents having gone home, he was left to wander in the streets without their protection. He saw the lady's signal, at her solicitation he entered the carriage, with his harp, and before he knew what to be done with him the carriage drove off. Night came on, and his distracted parents were driven almost wild. So many strange cases of kidnapping have lately occurred within metropolitan precincts, that it is no wonder they felt alarmed. They have since been reassured and recompensed, however, for what they were made to suffer. On getting to the lady's home with her, the lady had him shown to a bath-room, and provided with every toilet requisite. After bathing and shampooing, and dressing himself in the attire of a young gentleman, which she had provided for him, he was shown into the lady's presence, and requested to play upon the harp anything he knew. The strangeness of the adventure, the novelty of his position, at first embarrassed him so greatly that he broke down in everything he attempted. Possessing natural refinement, however, he succeeded in regaining his tranquillity, and when he had well-nigh exhausted his stock of melodies, hit upon a simple English air, which produced the strangest effect upon the lady. The blood left her cheeks as though it had been snatched away, the tears sprang to her eyes, and without hesitating a moment longer she rushed to the ottoman where the young bard was seated, and putting her arms around him, pressed her hands with an investigating motion upon his breast. He moved as if suddenly alarmed, and as though to repel her, but his motion tightened her embrace and only hastened the discovery she was making. That original expansion of bosom which her woman's touch had detected told a too truthful tale, and revealed that the young singer was, not a youth, but a person of her own sex. The anticipative reader will guess the rest, and I make a long story short by stating the simple fact that the lady proved to be a mother, who, in the artless countenance of the street-singer, recognized her long-lost chee-yid. Tables, Embrace, and explanations all round. The two wicked Italians are forgiven and pensioned off; identity proved by the simple song to which the blonde beauty was sung to sleep in earlier years. The only mysterious point that remained was, why did the girl assume a boy's disguise? This point she clears up by avowing that she could not bear the coarse looks and words which saluted her from men when she appeared attired in the garments of her sex. She therefore persuaded her pseudo-parents to allow her to adopt male garments, hoping thereby to elude the insult that is born of a coarse admiration of one's physique. The lady had much difficulty in persuading the girl and her "parents" to separate; but the separation was effected at last, and "eluded" by the girl's mother and her restored daughter sailing for Europe in a resort steamer. Truth is stranger than fiction—and not nearly so probable!

What a rush there will be to-morrow for the seaside! How cars and steamboats will be sardined! What a quantity of bathers will be snatching health and strength from a few moments' plunge in the briny shallows! How gratefully that man would be appreciated who should have a resort steamer. Truth is stranger than fiction—and not nearly so probable!
