The tugboat Cornelia belonging to H. B. Fane, a marine engineer, of 217 East One Hundred and Twenty-second street, was sunk shortly before 9 o'clock this morning at the foot of Bridge street, Brooklyn.

Most of the visitors were sick by that time and the party re-embarked for Grand street. The Mayor told the citizens that the tugboat was a bad one and they had just cause for complaint.

of wickedness that could not be resisted. Hester had come back that Spring for good; her college days were finished and she was trying to settle down again in the old life that seemed a dream.

Four years of city life, with the refining influences she had met. Had worked, marvellous change in the brown-eyed, quiet girl. She thought at first her father and mother had changed, and was puzzled, but when the real truth broke upon her she felt suddenly alienated, as though she had met a stranger.

"You are ungrateful, Hester!" she said sharply one evening. "I have cleared the supper table. Look at the money spent on you anywhere but stuck at home like a body."

Hester did not reply—she had learned better—and stood looking out of the window in a hopeless sort of way. She had earnestly tried to do her apparent duty, but life seemed very hard of late, cut off from congenial pursuits and friends.

"Mother!" Hester broke in desperately at last. "I do all in my power to please you, but I will not go with Mr. Parkins—I detest him!" and she fled to her room, where she threw herself sobbing upon her little white bed.

RAGS GALORE IN BROOKLYN.

The Health Board Apparently Has Much to Investigate.

Impossible to Keep Track of Every Bale of Rags, It Is Said.

A report to the effect that there had been a wholesale discharge among rag dealers of the conditions of the permits for the transhipment of rags issued by the Brooklyn health authorities was current to-day.

It is well known that there were hundreds of thousands of bales of rags of every kind in Brooklyn, notwithstanding the fact that no storage permits have been issued by the health commissioner since February.

So certain is it that dealers in rags have ignored the conditions in the bonds under which they are allowed to carry on business, that it was said this morning that a rigid investigation would be made.

Dr. D'Hourque, head of the permit bureau of shipments of rags received every month. It is impossible to keep track of every bale. All the signs are supposed to be sold to the street, and the whole consignment to be left over from a shipment.

It is fair to suppose, he added, that many of these bales find their way into storage houses in spite of the vigilance of the health commissioner. It will be made to Health Commissioner Griffin before night respecting the true state of affairs.

Four more New York City regiments, the Seventy-first, Twenty-second, Twelfth and Ninth, returned from Buffalo this morning, and again the militia of the city is all on hand ready for a call at any time.

The Twenty-second reached the Grand Central Depot at 9.20 o'clock, the Twelfth at 9.40 and the Ninth at 10.00. The regiments made a fine appearance as they marched to their armories.

The Seventy-first Regiment, Col. Francis V. Greene commanding, reached Jersey City by the Erie Railroad at 8.40 o'clock this morning, and it started up Broadway from Chambers street to its present headquarters at Lexington avenue and One Hundred and Seventh street.

The Seventy-first was stationed at East Buffalo to protect the Erie freight and stock yards and the Lake Shore stock yard.

Among the officers of the Seventy-first who returned this morning was Capt. Edwin Gould, Jay Gould's second son, who is Inspector of Rifle Practice. It was a capital roving experience, he said, and not so very disagreeable, although it was much less than the week he spent in camp at West Point.
