WHIP-HAND ON A HANDIT.

Old Stage Driver's Story of an Unexpected Victory on the Road.

"There is quite a difference between starting in the early days of the State and now," said William Miller, the owner of the stage line running from Casadero to Ukiah, addressing a writer for the San Francisco Call. "When I came here from Boston, in 1854, I drifted about a bit, and finally went into the service of Charles McLaughlin, the owner of the longest stage line in California at that time. It ran with relays from San Jose to Los Angeles.

WHIP-HAND ON A HANDIT.

ROBBER QUERELY TRAPPED.

Remarkable Adventure of a Cool-Headed Express Messenger.

My business is easy enough, as a rule, said the express messenger on a Western railway, whose story is told in an exciting chapter in the new volume of danger stories in the way least expected, so that we have to be prepared for emergencies. I have been on the road a good many years, and have had some queer experiences. One of the queerest, and on the whole most satisfactory to me, occurred a few weeks ago.

I was sitting alone in the car, reading when I chanced to glance in a small mirror which I had that day hung in the car. Reflected in it was the forward part of the buffalo, and something, which I did not at the head started me. The impulse to turn and look at the head itself was almost uncontrollable, but I was so cautious; so, retaining my composure, I took a second look into the mirror.

The mirror of a cowboy was sticking through one of the eye-sockets of that buffalo, and it was pointed directly at me. The danger was imminent. A false move, and I should be a dead man. One thought quickly at such a time, and I instantly decided on a plan of action. I then carefully, stretched lazily, and then began fumbling in my pocket, as if in search of something; then, as if feeling that I wanted to see the cowboy, I went out of range of that ugly muzzle.

My next move was to leap astride the buffalo, in order to hold the cowboy-robber where he was. My weight was too much; the framework collapsed, and the stuffing crowded hard on the main inside, holding him as in a vise. He was in a nice trap.

He groined and struggled at first, but he was fixed unless I chose to rise and give him his liberty—a thing I had no notion of doing. He tried thrice and bit his, but I had the rope fast, and I kept him so until he was given up to the authorities at Denver.

THE HEART OF A QUEEN.

Quickly Reached by a Pretty Little Humanist Girl.

Here is a pretty little story about Carmen Sylvia, who has the Philadelphia Press a few years ago, when she was in the zenith of her popularity and health. She visited a small village in the mountains and asked permission to put the children in their school.

The school-mistress was highly delighted. Although she was unaware of the high rank of her visitor, she gazed from outward appearances that the latter was of no common order. The children did their utmost to please, and with great promptness all the simple questions the queen put to them.

Just before leaving the queen noticed one little tot in a far corner of the room, with her tangled head of hair bent over some book. She called to her, and she crossed in her reading that she took no notice whatever of anybody in the room. The queen asked the reason of her silence, and she was deaf or otherwise afflicted?

"That is the answer," but she is stupid and never attends to her studies, but seizes every opportunity to read a story book. "Carmen Sylvia," she called to the little reader, and putting her hand on the curly head, asked gently how she was reading, and the latter held up the book to the strange lady.

It was "Fairy Stories and Poems," by Carmen Sylvia, like these tales," asked the author. "Like them, indeed, I do. I love them."

"And Carmen," she looked in her arms, kissed the little, flushed face and said, "I will read to you a story, and you will tell me if you like it." The queen received a letter from the queen offering to educate and bring up the child. The offer was gratefully accepted, and now the little one is in one of the best schools in Roumania.

THE DEALER "BIT."

Simple Device of a Youth to Raise the Price of Cast-Off Trousers.

A dapper young man walked into a second-hand clothing store in State, near Broadway, and unrolled from a package a pair of summer trousers, says the Chicago Times. As he threw them on the counter the dealer, who was also made a noise in striking the dealer.

"How much will you give me for these?" asked the dapper man. "Twenty-five cents," answered the dealer. "Well, how much?" asked the man. "Twenty-five cents is all they are worth."

"Then roll them up. I will give them to some poor fellow before selling them for that."

"Let me see," said the storekeeper, as he turned them over and thrust his hand in the left pocket. "Well, call it 50 cents."

"Holl them up. I won't take less than 50 cents."

"Three dollars!" exclaimed the merchant, that will buy a new pair."

"All right," said the dealer, "roll them up. I will give you $1."

The money was paid, the seller walked out, and the purchaser went to the back of the store, where he took out a wad of paper and two old-fashioned pennies.

WHEN HE FELT WORSE.

A Chicago Young Man Found Twas His Own Coin That Fell.

The misfortunes of others are filled with irresistible humor in many cases, particularly in the more trifling acts of every day. To see a man sit on his own stiff hat is related with keen enjoyment by every other man in sight.

Another man finds that the crash has come in reality to his own headgear after laughing wildly at the supposed hard luck of a friend. In the situation is a thousand times funnier.

A young man with this human trait, who had just bought a new hat, was sitting on a bench at a sharp pace, says the Chicago Times. He carried his mackintosh hung over his arm. At the crossing of Fifth avenue there was a rattle of coin and a shower of nickels and dimes falling from the pocket. It was some unknown region. No one was more astonished than the young man, and he stopped with great interest and watched passers eye the scattered currency as it fell.

Finally all of the pieces had been plucked up by small boys and other sensible persons, and he still had no trace of the source. The curious young man, who had just bought his hat, and had not about two blocks further on his way when his face lengthened and he exclaimed: "By Jove! that change fell out of my mackintosh pocket!"
