

WOMAN DYING, SHIELDS HUSBAND UNDER ARREST

"Don't Know Who Shot Me," Says Little Mrs. Carroll in Hospital.

In J. Hood Wright Hospital is a little woman battered with blows and shot twice through the head. In the West One Hundred and Twenty-ninth street station is a stout, broad-shouldered man with a mustached skin and the face of a cave man.

He says he didn't shoot and beat his wife, and she says he didn't either, but if she dies—and she probably will—the crime of murder is going to be entered against John G. Carroll, A. technical charge of felonious assault is the one under which Magistrate Kernochan, sitting in Harlem court, today held him to await the results of his wife's injuries.

"I did not quarrel with my husband. He didn't shoot me. I don't know who shot me," whispered the maimed woman as they carried her to the operating table at the hospital this morning for a desperate operation.

"I never shot nobody—I guess she must a-shot herself," whined Carroll to the reporter as he was led handcuffed out of the Police Court, after his preliminary examination.

"What won't a woman do to save a worthless brute's neck?" growled the detective who had the prisoner in charge. "We ought to have a clear case against this bully, but we won't have it unless the little woman changes her mind and tells the truth."
Out of Work Two Months.
The Carrolle, John G. and Annie, had a tiny flat at No. 148 Amsterdam avenue. With them the aged mother of the wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Graham, had been living. She did the housework because Annie, the wife, had to be out all day cleaning rooms for students at the Horace Mann School. Mrs. Carroll's small earnings have been running the establishment because for two months Carroll had not earned a penny. He is a stationary engineer, out of work at his trade, but able to keep in good standing in the Tammany organization of the district and able, too, to find the cash for the liquor that brought him home befuddled every night for the last fortnight.

Graham gave to a reporter for the Evening World the only known details of the shooting.
"Johnny was very much the worse for the drink when he came in yesterday afternoon," she said, "but he was so often that way that I took no heed for it. He asked me what we had for supper. I told him there was not hot soup and eggs and a dish of tea. He said that was dog's grub and then he jerked the dishes and the teapot out of my hands and threw them on the floor."
"I'll put the whole place on the bum," he says. He tried to go it, too, and he got angry again. He took Annie's dresser into strips and he told Annie to get up. He had there with him a pocket watch. Annie said in. He went up and down and asked her where she had been, and she said she had stayed to see some friends just as usual, and she said she had been in the morning she meant to go.

Heard the Shots.
"You see, he says to get up, you've been out with some man? She got him not to talk like that, and she got him to go into the front room. I stayed in the kitchen, for I was afraid. I could tell from her voice she was trying to get me to go into the front room. I heard a click and heard her cry out. I went in to see what was the matter. I saw her and more shots and Annie screamed, and I'm an old woman and I guess I fell in a faint. The next thing I knew I was lying on the hall floor and the place was full of people, and they were taking Annie away to the hospital."
Neighbors who heard the pistol shots run into the flat. Mrs. Carroll was stretched on the floor. She had been shot in the back of the neck and in the jaw. Two other bullets had gone wild. One had cracked a mirror and some had scathed the wall paper. On the woman's forehead was a huge bruise made, so Dr. Weisgarten said, by some dull implement. At her side lay a pistol and a heavy machinist's hammer.

Carroll, scared stiff, was dashing water in her face and telling her to be sensible and sit up.
"I never did it," was his first word as the neighbors burst in. "You know you tried to poison herself three years ago when the baby died."
Coroner Harbarger gave it up as an impossible task after vainly urging the wounded woman to name her assailant. She only shook her head.

"THEY ALL LOOK ALIKE TO MARY." This is the title of the next song to be given with the New York Sunday World. Words and music complete. Come song hit of "Lollies of 1907," which enjoyed a good run at the New York Theatre last year and is now on a return engagement. This is a great comic song. Words and music by Billy Kent; by arrangement with Theelee Shanno.

GAS CO. MUST PAY $15,000 FOR DEATH OF A WOMAN.

Husband Recovers Verdict for Carelessness of Employee in Turning On Supply.

The result, announced today of a hard-fought suit before Justice Guy and a jury in the Supreme Court, is of importance to practically every resident of the city, for it establishes that gas consumers have some rights which the gas monopoly is bound to respect. It was the case of Joseph Jameson, 57 No. 234 Eighth avenue, a clerk who was made a widower through the carelessness of an employee of the Central Union company Jameson and his young wife had moved into a new house at No. 1,021 Simpson street, in the Bronx, on April 1, 1906, and notified the Central Union Gas Company to turn on the gas.

For two days Mr. and Mrs. Jameson were dependent on kerosene lamps for illumination. On April 4, while Mr. Jameson went to market, Mrs. Jameson lay down for a nap. While she slept he gas man came, entered the cellar, and without notice to the tenants in the house turned on the gas from the street. When Mr. Jameson awoke he found his wife dead, and the room full of gas, from an unopened cover pipe.
