SEAMEN PICTURE MURDER WITH AID OF SHIP'S MODEL

Mate Struck Down Member of Crew With Brass Knuckle, Witness Says.

Judge Hough and a jury in the Criminal Court in the Federal Building to-day heard a second dramatic recital of the drowning of Axel Hansen on Aug. 6, last year, at the trial of Capt. Adolph C. Pedersen, the barkentine Puake's skipper, and his son, Adolph, charged with murder on the high seas. The jury made up of business and professional men, and laymen who probably have never been further to sea than the fishing banks off Coney Island heard Edward Reilly, a member of the Puake's crew relate his version of the tragedy, with their eyes fastened on a two-foot model of the four-masted vessel.

John W. Campbell, apprentice seaman, finished this morning as the first witness for the Government in its contention that Capt. Pedersen and his son, who was second mate, had caused Hansen to throw himself overboard while the Puake was crossing the South Seas en route from Victoria, B. C., to Cape Town, Africa. Reilly, who is an able-bodied seaman hailing from Ireland, gave even more details than did Campbell yesterday. In answer to questioning by Assistant United States Attorney Ben A. Matthews, who is leading the Government's prosecution, Reilly launched into a straightforward narrative of the events of the morning of Aug. 6, and his resorting to odd and homely sea terms and pointing out on the model of the Puake the points on the deck involved he lent color to his yarn.

That Adolph Eric Pedersen, the second mate, felled Hansen with a blow on the jaw with a "knuckle duster," or brass knuckle device clenched in his hand, was an additional point brought out in Reilly's testimony. Campbell was not as close to the struggle on the deck, Reilly said, but the younger seaman said he heard Hansen protest against the beating, and threaten to throw himself overboard if struck again. How Hansen went over, and for a time clung to the logline, 150 feet in the wake of the barkentine, and finally let go and was swallowed up in the sea, Reilly told, and he said he, like others of the crew on deck, was struck dumb at the refusal of the officers to hold to and pick the man up. Seven members of the Puake's crew in all will testify as to Hansen's drowning. There are to be heard yet Jack Joe, who was at the wheel; James Campbell, Frank Grienell and William Jones, seamen hailing from Canada, and William Mattoon, another Canadian, who was the ship's carpenter.

The prosecution will probably take up to-morrow with its witnesses, and the case is not likely to be finished this week.
