Woodland Wonder Tales

By Cousin Eleanor

No. 40.—Billy Brighteyes Entertains Visitors.

For Billy Brighteyes the woodland had lost its wonder. With all its songs and sounds it seemed too quiet and, though friends and foes without number lived near, Billy Brighteyes was lonely. Imagine, then, how he welcomed a visit from his city relatives!

They had come unexpectedly and were in his tree waiting for him when he got back from a bit of a run in the treetops. When he first saw them from a distance Billy Brighteyes was intending to chase "those three impudent squirrels," but coming nearer he recognized his aunt, uncle and cousin and called "Hello, folks. How are you?"

"Ah, my dear William," said his aunt Aggie, "how do you do?" "Lo, oh! man," was his uncle's greeting, and his Cousin Mary, when presented, was "very pleased to meet her country cousin. I have heard so many fascinating things about your woodland estate," she told him.

"Branch out," said Billy to himself. "They did not talk that way when they lived here." But then he had heard that city life changes people so. It surely seemed to be true.

"We're used to city life," Uncle Ezra told Billy. Billy Brighteyes knew that this meant that he must get things for his visitors to eat and have them ready by that time, but he was glad enough for their company to do it.

"All right," he told his uncle. "I'll have a spread set by that time." "Heavily dark in here," Uncle Ezra remarked to Aunt Aggie. "Terribly," she agreed. But Mary said, "I think it's sweet; I like it so."

"Just as soon as the lights go up and a body can see, we'll go down to the lake and wash up," said Uncle Ezra to his family.

"What light do you mean?" asked Billy Brighteyes. "The Moon!" "Ha, ha! Ho, ho!" laughed his uncle. "Moon, you say? No, my boy, we city people never think of the moon. But we'll forgive you on account of your youth. You're romantic, of course." Then casting a sly glance at his daughter Mary he said: "It is right that you young folks should think of the moon. But I was speaking of the arc lights. The park where we live is just full of them. I don't see how any one can get along without them, do you?"

"I'm afraid that you will have to learn to abide you are here," answered Billy. "There are no arc lights in the woodland."

"No arc lights here?" asked Aunt Aggie. "Why this is the very place you need them most. It's dark as pitch."

"And I'm not romantic, either," Billy Brighteyes told Uncle Ezra. "The moon gives the only light we have to see by after sundown."

"Oh, really!" said his male relative. "Well, well! if that's the case we must hurry. Come, wife, let us find the lake before it gets too dark to see."

"There's a stream on the other side of the meadow," Billy Brighteyes informed them. "Sorry I can't go with you, but I can't be your guide and have dinner ready when you get back too."

"You needn't trouble yourself," snapped Aunt Aggie. "I won't set out of this tree with the piece getting gloomier every minute." "I'll go, daddy," piped Mary, and tripped lightly after Uncle Ezra. They did not go more than three feet from the tree when a squeal told Billy Brighteyes that something had happened, and Mary came limping back to her mother.

"You poor darling, what is the matter?" asked Aunt Aggie. "I tripped over a little root that stuck so," and Mary put up her front toe to show how the root grew. "You'd better stay home, dear," advised her mother. Then in a loud whisper she observed: "The place is poorly kept. I noticed it when we came."

"I Tripped Over a Root," Said Mary.

"Mother, please, don't be rude," pleaded Mary. "I'll try not to, child, but this is a dreadful place."

"Fang!"

"Ugh!" screamed Aunt Aggie. "What was that?" cried Uncle Ezra from half way up the tree.

"That was a shot," answered Billy. "A shot! Do you mean to say that they allow shooting?"

"Of course they do," Billy was laughing at his uncle's scared face. "What's there to laugh at, young fellow?"

"You look as though you had seen a fox," said Billy Brighteyes. "And are there foxes here too?" "Thousands of them," Billy Bright-eyes was finding it fun to frighten Uncle Ezra.

"Guess I'm not so travel-stained that I can't eat just as I am," Uncle Ezra decided.

"No, you look all right," said Billy Brighteyes. "And now since you all are staying at home suppose you get the dinner ready while I go out for a space. I do enjoy a run before meals. So long. See you later." A minute after Billy was out of sight. And Aunt Aggie had to get the dinner. What else could she do?

Sweet May.
May, that frowns the land from gloom.
Children, children, up and see!
All her stores of jollity!
Sing ye, join the chorus gay!
Hail the merry, merry May.

The Stars.
Peeping over the moonlit sky,
Are the little stars;
They gaze first at the earth below,
Then at the far-off Mars.
They dot the sky 'most every where
They twinkle all the night,
And aid the moon to supply us all
With abundance of cheerful light.
They vanish when the gray dawn comes.
But return again very soon;
For when the twilight does appear
They shine out with the moon.

War Hero's Body Identified by Mother.
A body found in the East River at the foot of East 37th Street on Saturday was identified at the Morgue today as that of Nicholas Battaglio, thirty-two years old, of No. 471 Canal Street, by his mother. Battaglio was a letter carrier before the war. He served in France with the 77th Division and came home a mental and physical wreck as the result of wounds and gas inhalation. As no provision has been made for insane soldiers it was necessary to send Battaglio to the Manhattan State Asylum on Ward's Island. He attempted to swim to the Manhattan shore on April 5 and was drowned.
