MILDRED

THE STORY OF A GIRL WHO LOVED AND LOST

1921—THE BELL SYNDICATE—INC.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Virgil Adams, convalescing from a serious illness, was importuned by his wife to embark upon a business venture of his own. His daughter, Alice, twenty-two petted him, but secretly looked her mother.

CHAPTER VIII.

"H. I know he thinks it does," Campbell admitted plaintively. "I suppose we've got to let him take it, but he's got to depend on us to run the making of the stuff. You better ask him the same story I do, and mine's going to be high."

CHAPTER IX.

HE WAS out in his taxi cab again the next morning. Not twice a crow's mile from his own house there was a decayed "industrial district" of earlier days.

Opposite the dismantled factory was a muddy, open lot of two acres or so, and near the middle of the lot stood a long brick shed. But the brick shed had two wooden chimneys, and here was the "industrial district" enterprise. It was for sale or to let, "pretty near to be given away," he learned, if anybody would take it.

Late Sunday afternoon Adams walked over to Old Charley Lohr, and gave his friend the letter. He said, "I guess I'll have to get Charley, in case he says anything about it—and remember if you ever do get a chance to put in a good word for me, say that I'm a good fellow."

Adams looked serious. "I hope," he said, "I ain't anything the ole man'll think might injure on whatever he had you in mind. You know I'm a free-handed man as walks this earth; but if he got the idea anybody was trying to get the better of him, he'd keep 'em from doing it. Not that I think you might be tryin' to get the better of him, Virgil. What I mean is, if you got a chance for the ole man to think you might be—"

"Oh, no," Adams interrupted. "The process I'm going to use is a lot of dirt worked on for him."

"Well," said Lohr. "Of course you know what you're up to. Have you got the ole man yet?"

"No, I thought I'd write him a letter."

"My soul!" his friend exclaimed. "Why on earth don't you just go down there and tell him?"

"Yes, I know," he said. "But I can't quite seem to get away from the fact that the principle of the process is a good deal the same, or pretty near a perfect right to it, as a person might say. It was just a secret; but I ain't got nothin' to be ashamed of. There isn't any way in the world it could be made a question of law." He sighed again, and Adams took a good deal to know what he thought.

Six weeks from the day Adams had obtained his lease he began his plan. He had reached his home the evening of that first day. Then he put on fresh clothes, but after dinner he seemed to be haunted.
