Mr. Dickens's Speech at Hartford.

GENTLEMEN:—To say that I thank you for the earnest manner in which you have drank the toast just now so eloquently proposed to you—to say that I give you back your kind wishes and good feelings with more than compound interest—and that I feel how dumb and powerless the best acknowledgements would be beside such genial hospitality as yours—is nothing. To say that in this winter season, flowers have sprung up in every footstep's length of the path which has brought me here—that no country ever smiled more pleasantly than yours has smiled on me—and that I have rarely looked upon a brighter summer prospect, than that which lies before me now—is nothing. (Applause.)

But it is something to be no stranger in a strange place—to feel, sitting at a board for the first time, the ease and affection of an old guest—and to be at once on such intimate terms with the family, as to have a homely genuine interest in its every member—it is, I say, something to be in this novel and happy frame of mind—and as it is of your creation, and owes its being to you, I have no reluctance in urging it as a reason why, in addressing you, I should not so much consult the form and fashion of my speech, as I should employ that universal language of the heart, which you, and such as you, best teach, and best can understand. Gentlemen, in that universal language—common to you in America, and to us in England, as that younger mother tongue, which, by the means and through the happy union of our two great countries shall be spoken, ages hence, by land and sea, over the wide surface of the globe—I thank you.

I had occasion, gentlemen, to say the other night in Boston, as I have more than once had occasion to remark before, that it is not easy for an author to speak of his own books. If the task be a difficult one at any time, its difficulty certainly is not diminished when a recipient recurrence to the same theme, has left one nothing new to say. Still I feel that in a company like this, and especially after what has been said by the President, that I ought not to pass lightly over those labors of love, which, if they had no other merit, have been the happy means of bringing us together.

It has been often observed that you cannot judge of an author's personal character from his writings; it may be that you cannot—I think it very likely for many reasons, that you cannot—but at least, a reader will rise from the perusal of a book with some defined and tangible idea of the writer's moral creed and broad purposes, if he has any at all: and it is probable enough that he may like to have this idea confirmed from the author's lips, or dissipated by his explanation. Gentlemen, my moral creed—which is a very wide and comprehensive one, and includes all sects and parties—is very easily summed up. I have faith, and I wish to diffuse faith in the existence—yes, of beautiful things, even in those conditions of society, which one so degenerate, degraded and forlorn, that at first sight it would seem as though they could not be described but by a strange and terrible reversal of the words of Scripture—God said let there be light and there was none. I take it, that we are born, and that we hold our sympathies, hopes and energies, in trust for the Many, and not for the Few. That we cannot hold in too strong a light of disgust, and contempt, before the view of others, all meanness, falsehood, cruelty and oppression, of every grade and kind. Above all, that nothing is high, because it is in a high place; and that nothing is low, because it is in a low one. (Loud applause.) This is the lesson taught us in the great Book of Nature. This is the lesson which may be read, alike in the bright track of the stars, and in the dusty course of the poorest thing that drags its tiny length upon the ground. This is the lesson ever uppermost in the thoughts of that inspired man, who tells us that there are

"Tongues in the trees; books in the running brooks:
Sermons in stones; and good in every thing." (Cheers.)

Gentlemen, keeping these objects steadily before me, I am at no loss to refer your favor and your generous hospitality back to the right source.—While I know on the one hand that if, instead of being what it is, this were a land of tyranny and wrong, I should care very little for your smiles or frowns, so I am sure upon the other that if, instead of being what I am, I were the greatest genius that ever trod the earth, and had diverted myself for the oppression and degradation of mankind, you would despise and reject me. I hope you will whenever, through such means, I give you the opportunity. Trust me, that whenever you give me the like occasion, I will return the compliment with interest.

Gentlemen, as I have no secrets from you, in the spirit of confidence you have engendered between us, and as I have made a kind of compact with myself that I never will, while I remain in America, omit an opportunity of referring to a topic in which I and all others of my class on both sides of the great water are equally interested—equally interested—there is no difference between us—I would beg leave to whisper in your ear two words—International Copyright. I use them in no sordid sense, believe me, and those who know me best, best know that. For myself, I would rather that my children, coming after me, trudged in the mud, and knew by the general feeling of society, that their father was beloved and had been of some use, than I would have them ride in their carriages, and know by their banker's books that he was rich. But I do not see, I confess, why one should be obliged to make the choice, or why fame, besides playing that delightful revell for which she is so justly celebrated, should not blow out of he trumpet a few notes of a different kind from those with which she has hitherto contented herself.

It was well observed the other night by a beautiful speaker whose words went to the heart of every man who heard him, that if there had existed any law in this respect, Scott might not have sunk beneath the mighty pressure on his brain, but might have lived to add new creatures of his fancy to the crowd which swarms about you in your summer walks, and gather round your winter evening hearths.

As I listened to his words, there came back, fresh upon me, that touching scene in the great man's life, when he lay upon his couch, surrounded by his family, and listened for the last time to the rippling of the river, he had so well loved, over its stony bed. I pictured him to myself, faint, wan, dying, crushed both in mind and body by his honorable struggle: and hovering round him the phantoms of his own imagination—Waverley, Ravenswood, Jeanie Deans, Rob Roy, Caleb Balderstone, Dominie Sampson—all the familiar throng—with cavaliers, and Puritans, and Highland chiefs innumerable overflowing the chamber, and fading away in the dim distance beyond—I pictured them fresh from traversing the world, and hanging down their heads in shame and sorrow, that from all those lands into which they had carried gladness, instruction and delight to millions, they brought him not one friendly hand to help to raise him from that sad, sad bed. No, nor brought him from that land in which his own language was spoken, and in every house and hut at which his own books were read in his own tongue, one grateful dollar-piece to buy a garland for his grave.—Oh! if every man who goes from here, as many do, to look upon that tomb in Dryburgh Abbey, would but remember this, and bring the recollection home!

Gentlemen, I thank you again, and once again, and many times to that. You have given me a new reason for remembering this day, which is already one of mark in my calendar, it being my birth day and you have given those who are nearest and dearest to me a new reason for recollecting it with pride and interest. Heaven knows that, although I should grow ever so grey, I shall need nothing to remind me of this epoch in my life. But I am glad to think that from this time you are inseparably connected with every recurrence of this day: and that, on its periodical return, I shall always, in imagination, have the unfading pleasure of entertaining you as my guests, in return for the gratification you have afforded me to-night.

Murders in Arkansas.

CHEROKEE NATION, Jan. 18th, 1842.

To the Editor of the Arkansas Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: It is not my design to bring names before the public, or to make crime tempting by giving publicity to enormous offences. But as it seems to be the order of the day to publish Indian outrages, permit me to state that, a Lieutenant of the Army, a few days since, shot a Mr. R——— W———, a citizen of the Cherokee Nation, in the back, lodging in the unfortunate man a load of buck-shot. The offence of the citizen seems to have been his growing angry at the Lieutenant taking off the citizen's wife, who was part Indian, part negro, and a little more white, and going back to the house of Mr. W. after the inamorata's clothes. Mr. W. actually complained at this interference with his family arrangements—and by his complaints has forfeited his life, to the more victorious military knight. Is not this a fair offset to Alberty's case? At any rate, ought it not to atone for the life of poor Klopp, the soldier? TRAVELER.

Remarks of the Intelligencer on the above:

We publish the foregoing account, because we have no doubt that, no matter what may be the impropriety of bringing matters, which are to be the subject of legal investigation, before the public, this circumstance will find its way into the newspapers. We understand that the officers at Fort Gibson are generally enraged at the conduct of the Lieutenant. We have further learned that the Lieutenant is under arrest.

In answer to our correspondent, we have to remark, that this crime, although sufficiently enormous, forms no offset against the other offences mentioned by him. The account, as we recollect the newspaper instances, stands thus. About a year ago, a drunken Indian murdered an inoffensive citizen, in the county of Washington in a most unprovoked and wanton manner. On the 4th of last July, some three United States soldiers, in the county of Benton, killed two aged Cherokees in a most barbarous manner. Sometime afterwards a United States soldier is found in the Cherokee Nation hung by the neck. Next in order, Alberty, a Cherokee by the name, but white man in appearance, kills Long, a citizen of Arkansas, with a stone. Then a Lieutenant, placed in the Nation alike for the protection of the two Nations, violates the most sacred rights, and shoots the enraged husband. Now, if nobodys' lives were endangered but those engaged in these disgraceful broils, the account would seem to stand about equal. But in the mean time the most exaggerated accounts go abroad; immigration to our country is greatly retarded; and the peace of those who mind their own business on both sides of the line is endangered. To a thinking man, it is doubtless a subject of sober inquiry, as to the cause of these outrages. Does it arise from any natural hatred between the two races? We venture to say, that it does not. But the abominable traffic of ardent spirits in the Nation, and along the line, is the true cause of every single outrage. The only difference between the Indian and white man when drunk is, that one is a fool, and the other has no sense whatever. Keep both sober, and they are generally harmless: make them drunk, and no one should be surprised at their crimes. If the good people of Arkansas, and the United States Army, would seriously engage in the suppression of this traffic, they would contribute far more to the preservation of peace, than by any military movements. And to begin right, we must begin at the root of the evil. We must appeal to the reason of our own citizens. Let us convince them of their error, and we shall have accomplished a greater revolution than can ever be accomplished by laws or arms. As an inducement to the good work, we open our columns for the thinking on both sides of the line. Let us hear from you, citizens and soldiers, Indians and Missionaries. Who is for peace, and who for Alcohol? Arouse every friend of the good cause. Hold responsible those sowers of discord—those who are lighting the midnight torch—the keepers of these border sinks of iniquity—whiskey shops!

MUTUAL INSURANCE.—On Dwelling Houses and Furniture only, profits returned to the Assured.—THE HOUSEHOLDERS' MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Office 45 Merchants' Exchange, corner of William and Wall-streets. The attention of Householders is respectfully requested to the annexed plan for separating the insurance of Dwelling Houses and Furniture, from that of Stores and Merchandise.

It is well known that almost all the losses incurred in the business of insurance, are the result of the burning of valuable stores and costly goods.

This increases the expense of insurance to the householder, and may possibly deprive him of the very security for which he pays his premium, as was the case in the great fire of 1835, when the whole capitals of so many insurance companies were totally lost by the destruction of this kind of property; and many dwellings left for a time wholly unprotected by insurance.

A safer feature recommended to your attention, is the division of the profits among those who are insured by this Company.

The cash payments or premiums form a fund, which, after paying expenses and losses, is represented by scrip, and is issued to the assured in proportion to the amount of their insurance, which is thus obtained at cost; and should the business of the Company at all realize the expectations of the directors the expenses of insurance upon dwelling houses and furniture will be diminished by more than one half of the present rates, by reason of the return of the earned premiums.

This Company is prepared to insure against loss or damage by fire, Dwelling Houses, Household Furniture, Plate, Family Stores, Libraries, Pictures, Statuary, Cabinets of Minerals and other objects, Anatomical Collections, and all Household Property, ordinarily kept in dwelling houses. Every person insuring with this Company is entitled to one vote for each hundred dollars insured.

The rates of insurance and all other particulars may be obtained on application at the office of the Company.

DIRECTORS.
