

RUSSIA'S TARIFF POLICY.

AN UNBREAKABLE DEADLOCK NOT ANTICIPATED.

M. DE WITTE'S POSITION EXPLAINED—WHAT SUGAR PRODUCERS IN RUSSIA CAN COUNT ON.

St. Petersburg, Feb. 22.—Although the situation arising out of the Russo-American tariff controversy is unquestionably full of peril, neither well informed Americans nor well informed Russians anticipate an unbreakable deadlock. The most hopeful feature of the case is the fact that the political relations between the two Powers remain absolutely unaffected.

The present commercial question will be decided in due time by the proper authorities of both countries. It has not interrupted in the slightest the cordial relations which have always existed between the United States and Russia.

A fear has been expressed that any American concession would be considered a sign of weakness by Western Europe, eagerly waiting for an opportunity to make a concerted onslaught upon American exports and the American tariff system.

My sentiments for America, like Russia's relations with her, are warmer and closer than in the case of all Europe.

An authoritative exposition of the Russian position, just given to the correspondent of The Associated Press, explains why Russia did not wait for the decision of the United States Supreme Court, and did not strictly measure the response to fit American action.

There is no truth whatever in the statement that permanently high prices are contemplated by the Russian policy. Prices have fallen within ten years from eight to five and a half pence.

It is argued by competitors that because domestic prices are higher in Russia than elsewhere, producers are able to sell lower abroad, and that producers could not sell advantageously at the present export prices if they were not assured of a premium on domestic sales.

Conformably to law, the Minister annually fixes the amount of sugar to be produced and disposed of on the domestic market.
