

THE DRAMA.

RICHARD MANSFIELD.

On Monday night, at the New Amsterdam Theatre, the crowning act of the New-York dramatic season will occur when Richard Mansfield makes his last appearance here in Schiller's tragedy, "The Robbers."

There are powerful forces contending for the possession of the American stage. In certain respects, contending more actively than Mr. Mansfield is, but this actor is the dominant actor, and his withdrawal will, inevitably, weaken the theatre and retard the advancement of dramatic art in this country.

With the steady tramp of the elephants, the roar of the lions and the baying of the trained dogs, the circus has been the custom to regard as impossible the combination of artistic principle and artistic "business talent" in the control of theatrical affairs.
