The Queen writes explaining that the sense of justice induces her to break the customary precedent of "veiling ourselves in dignified and impenetrable silence," and proceeds to describe the patience of the King during his illness of a year, in the latter months of which he never had a night free from pain, which he met with clenched fists.

"As I have the gift of being able to read for many hours consecutively," the Queen writes, "I have an interesting and amusing way of insisting on sharing no part of his nursing with any one else, and I never had a better patient. It is a pity no one can glance at the peace of this sick chamber."

DR. CRAPSEY RESIGNS.

Continued from first page. There I will win it for every church and every soul in Christendom. If I fall before that court, it will be because I am wrong in my conception of the truth. Let my brethren within the Church abide the issue of this trial. For when the Great Tribunal of Free Thought has decided this contention the men who administer the Church on earth will conform to its decision. It is in this work of showing that God is in Man and Man is in God that I consecrate the rest of my life.
